"POOR, YET MAKING MANY RICH."

Bella Cooke's Wonderful Work for Christ Among the East Side Poor in New York—
 Her Whole Life an Evangel of Divine Grace and Blessing.

POOR in all that constitutes worldly wealth, yet rich in spirit and in the knowledge of God's love and care, a woman lies in an upper room of a rear tenement on Second Avenue, New York City, in a condition of confirmed invalidism. She has lain thus for nearly thirty-eight years, and through it all, the sweet sunshine of heaven has lighted up her face and gladdened her heart in a way that the outer world dreamed not of. The Shut-in is Mrs. Bella Cooke, whose remarkable life story is already known to many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Her rare spirituality and her perfect confidence in the Heavenly Father have made her career a marvel and an inspiration to hundreds of men and women who have come to know her and her work. Many who have been blessed with wealth, have for years found in Bella Cooke an almoner through whom to dispense their charities to the worthy poor, for besides her active Christian life, this wonderful bed-ridden woman, who for 40 years has not crossed the threshold of her room, is an active humanitarian and missionary. For miles along the populous East-side of New York, her name is known and spoken with reverend gratitude by many hundreds whom she has helped, and in the prayers of the poor in that section of the great metropolis, she is held in loving remembrance.

Although she has no income—not a dollar in the world which she can call her own—she is the disburser of several thousand dollars every year, which come to her from all parts of the country, for the furtherance of her work among the neglected children, and the mothers of the poor. Two generations of little waifs and strays, whom she helped to raise to Christian manhood and womanhood, call her blessed, and her sunny little room is frequently crowded with her proteges who love "Mother Cooke" dearly. From her they have come to know Jesus and to strive to be like him: lying propped up amid her pillows, she has taught their young feet to seek the Way of Life and their young lips to sing the Redeemer's praises. She has fed these waifs and cared for them, summer and winter, for she has no lack of willing helpers to assist in carrying on the work, outside of the little bedroom sanctuary in the rear tenement. Her swinging desk, which comes out from the wall and overhangs the bed, is a single leaf or table of wood and on it she contrives to keep up a correspondence—writing letters full of spiritual encouragement to some weak or wayward one, or acknowledging the generous kindness of some friend of the children. "Her poor," she calls them, and truly they are her poor; for if the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could but see the slums they come to her and are instantly won by her kindness and sweetness.

In that little geranium-scented room they first learned to pray, the bed-ridden motherly woman guiding their devotions. From it they go to a mission Sunday School where many others have gone before them. In it, they are clad in warm decent garments instead of the rags they formerly wore. Mrs. Cooke's Christianity is essentially practical. Her larder, supplied by an unflinching Providence, provides for the needs of many families who live in the meanest quarter of the East side. At Thanksgiving and Christmas, when her well-to-do patrons are generously disposed, she is able to send dinners to many homes in which otherwise the season of universal rejoicing would be sad and meaningless.

Never a moment idle, and so happy and light-hearted that one cannot help thinking some of the sunshine of childhood has remained to gild her later years, Bella Cooke's life is a beautiful illustration of the perfect faith of the true believer and the joy that comes from complete surrender to Christ. "I have 3,000 persons call upon me every year, and they keep me busy," she said. "In summer, I have my tea-parties, at which my guests are all old ladies, over sixty years of age, and a few much older. After tea we have singing, experiences and prayer. About twelve or thirteen are present season quite a number of women with babies on day trips to Rockaway, Glen Island and other places by the seashore: I suppose I have sent well on to 1,000 this year. Of course," she added humbly, "this is all done with money that is given to me for these purposes. The autumn is even busier for me. On Thanksgiving I serve several hundred poor families with turkeys and chickens and bright beads for the little ones. It has been the same on previous Thanksgivings. Each of the children got a necklace, and everybody got a text of Scripture suitable for the occasion. Then, when Christmas comes, my poor are with me in force. Last Christmas many of the most needy families got a basket of provisions each, and about 250 children were delighted by receiving toys, oranges and candies. Hundreds of garments were also distributed."

For two years past at Thanksgiving and Christmas-time, it has been the custom of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to devote a certain portion of its income to the relief of poor families who would otherwise be forgotten at these seasons of universal rejoicing. In making these arrangements, Bella Cooke's "poor" have been remembered, and her "list" of worthy and necessitous families has been included in the general distribution. During the present winter the amount of suffering among the poor has been greatly increased, and the numbers of the destitute have swelled beyond all previous proportions. Concerning her recent work, Mrs. Cooke writes us:

"The work for the past few weeks, preparing for my poor, proved almost too much for this frail body, and but for kindly aid from dear ones, I could not have done anything for them. On account of the hardness of the times, I found I would not be able to supply all I wanted to. Again, as last year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD kindly came to my help and sent for names of families to supply, for some of whom nothing had been prepared. I wish all your staff could have seen those whom you so kindly helped, as they came, one after another, some with tears, them as they stand grouped by the bedside of this saintly woman, and hear their words of love and gratitude as they listen to her teaching and join in her prayers, they would better understand the divine bond of spiritual motherhood that unites Bella Cooke to these waifs. From the street, the alley and at each of these parties. Then there are other summer duties in which I engage. For several years I have sent a number of poor children to the country, some of them for one or two weeks, according to their needs. I send them to places in New Jersey and Connecticut. Besides this, I send during the showing me a roll of bills: 'Just see, Mrs. Cooke, the lady from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD brought me this to pay my rent, and now I can keep my rooms, for you know I was to be put out on Friday with my six little ones.' 'This woman I have known for many years. She has a worthless husband. Others came, too. Mrs. Cooke, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent me half a ton of coal. I am so thankful. Won't you thank them for me?' Mrs. Cooke, SHORTENED LIVES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.
Text: Isa. 57: 1, "The righteous is taken away from the evil to come."

WE have written for the last time at the head of our letters and business documents the figures 1893. With this day closes the year. In January last we celebrated its birth. To-day we attend its obsequies. Another twelve months have been cut out of our earthly continuance, and it is a time for absorbing reflection.

We all spend much time in panegyric of longevity. We consider it a great thing to live to be an octogenarian. If any one dies in youth we say, "What a pity!" Dr. Muhlenberg in old age, said that the hymn written in early life by his own hand, no more expressed his sentiment when it said:

I would not live always.

If one be pleasantly circumstanced he never wants to go. William Cullen Bryant, the great poet, at eighty-two years of age standing in my house in a festal group, reading "Thanatopsis" without spectacles, was just as anxious to live as when at eighteen years of age he wrote the immortal threnody. Cato wept at eighty years of age that he would not live to learn Greek. Monaldesco at 115 years, writing the history of his time, feared a collapse. Theophrastus writing a book at ninety years of age was anxious to live to complete it. Thurlow Weed at about eighty-six years of age found life as great a desirability as when he snuffed out his first politician. Albert Barnes so well prepared for the next world at seventy said he would rather stay here. So it is all the way down. I suppose that the last time Methuselah was out of doors in a storm he was afraid of getting his feet wet lest it shorten his days. Indeed, I some time ago preached a sermon on the blessings of longevity, but in this, the last day of 1893, and when many are filled with sadness at the thought that another chapter of their life is closing, and that they have 365 days less to live, I propose to preach to you about the advantages of an abbreviated earthly existence.

If I were an agnostic I would say a man is blessed in proportion to the number of years he can stay on "terra firma," because after that he falls off the docks, and if he is ever picked out of the depths it is only to be set up in some morgue of the universe to see if anybody will claim him. If I thought God made man only to last forty or fifty or a hundred years, and then he was to go into annihilation, I would say his chief business ought to be to keep alive and even in good weather to be very cautious, and to carry an umbrella and take overshoes, and life-preservers, and bronze armor, and weapons of defense lest he fall off into nothingness and obliteration.

But, my friends, you are not agnostics. You believe in immortality and the eternal residence of the righteous in heaven, and therefore I first remark that an abbreviated earthly existence is to be desired, and is a blessing because it makes one's life-work very compact.

Some men go to business at seven o'clock in the morning and return at seven in the evening. Others go at eight o'clock and return at twelve. Others go at ten and return at four. I have friends who are ten hours a day in business, others who are five hours, others who are one hour. They all do their work well; they do their entire work and then they return. Which position do you think the most desirable? You say, other things being equal, the man who is the shortest time detained in business and who can return home the quickest is the most blessed. Now, my friends, why not carry that good sense into the subject of transference from this world? If a person die in childhood, he gets through his work at nine o'clock in the morning. If he die at forty-five years of age, he gets through his work at twelve o'clock noon. If he die at seventy years of age, he gets through his work at five o'clock in the afternoon. If he die at ninety, he has to toil all the way on up to eleven o'clock at night. The sooner we get through our work the better. The harvest all in barrack or barn, the farmer does not sit down in the stubble field, but shouldering his scythe and taking his pitcher from under a tree, he makes a straight line for the old homestead. All we want to be anxious about is to get our work done and well done, the quicker the better.

Again: There is a blessing in an abbreviated earthly existence in the fact that moral disaster might come upon the man if he tarried longer. A man who had been prominent in churches, and who had been admired for his generosity and kindness everywhere, for forgery was sent to State prison for fifteen years. Twenty years before there was no more probability of that man's committing a commercial dishonesty than that you will commit commercial dishonesty. The number of men who fall into ruin between fifty and seventy years of age is simply appalling. If they had died thirty years before it would have been better for them and better for their families. The shorter the voyage the less chance for a cyclone.

There is a wrong theory abroad that if one's youth be right his old age will be right. You might as well say there is nothing wanting for a ship's safety except to get it fully launched on the Atlantic Ocean. I have sometimes asked those who were school mates or college mates of some great defrauder, "What kind of a boy was he? What kind of a young man was he?" and they have said, "Why, he was a splendid fellow; I had no idea he could ever go into such an outrage." The fact is the great temptation of life sometimes comes far on in mid life, or in old age.

The first time I crossed the Atlantic Ocean it was as smooth as a mill pond and I thought the sea captains and the voyagers had slandered the old ocean, and I wrote home an essay for a magazine on "The Smile of the Sea," but I never afterward could have written that thing, for before we got home we got a terrible shaking up. The first voyage of life may be very smooth; the last may be a euroclydon. Many who start life in great prosperity do not end it in prosperity.

The great pressure of temptation comes sometimes in this direction: at about forty-five years of age, a man's nervous system changes, and some one tells him he must take stimulants to keep himself up, and he takes stimulants to keep himself up, until the stimulants keep him down, or a man has been going along for thirty or forty years in unsuccessful business, and here is an opening where by one dishonorable action he can lift himself and lift his family from all financial embarrassment. He attempts to leap the chasm and he falls into it.

Then it is in after life that the great temptation of success comes. If a man make a fortune before thirty years of age, he generally loses it before forty. The solid and the permanent fortunes for the most part do not come to their climax until in mid life, or in old age. The most of the bank presidents have white hair. Many of those who have been largely successful have been flung of arrogance or worldliness or dissipation in old age. They may not have lost their integrity, but they have become so worldly and so selfish under the influence of large success that it is evident to everybody that their success has been a temporal calamity and an eternal damage. Concerning many people it may be said it seems as if it would have been better if they could have embarked from this life at twenty or thirty years of age. Do you know the reason why the vast majority of people die before thirty-five? It is because they have not the moral endurance for that which is beyond the thirty, and a merciful God will not allow them to be put to the fearful strain.

Again: There is a blessing in an abbreviated earthly existence in the fact that one is the sooner taken off the defensive. As soon as one is old enough to take care of himself he is put on his guard. Bolts on the door to keep out the robbers. Fire-proof safes to keep off the flames. Life insurance and fire insurance against accident. Receipts lest you have to pay a debt twice. Lifeboat against shipwreck. Westinghouse air brake against railroad collision. There are many ready to overreach you and take all you have. Defence against cold, defence against heat, defence against sickness, defence against the world's abuse, defence all the way down to the grave, and even the tombstone sometimes is not a sufficient barricade. If a soldier who has been on guard, shivering and stung with the cold, pacing up and down the parapet with shouldered musket, is glad when some one comes to relieve guard and he can go inside the fortress, ought not that man to shout for joy who can put down his weapon of earthly defence and go into the King's castle? Who is the more fortunate, the soldier who has to stand guard twelve hours, or the man who has to stand guard six hours? We have common sense about everything but religion, common sense about everything but transference from this world.

Again: There is a blessing in an abbreviated earthly existence in the fact that one escapes so many bereavements. The longer we live the more attachments and the more kindred, the more chords to be wounded or rasped or sundered. If a man live on to seventy or eighty years of age, how many graves are cleft at his feet! In that long reach of time father and mother go, brothers and sisters go, children go, grandchildren go, personal friends outside the family circle whom they had loved with a love like that of David and Jonathan.

Beside that, some men have a natural trepidation about dissolution, and ever and anon during forty or fifty or sixty years, this horror of their dissolution shudders through soul and body. Now, suppose the lad goes at sixteen years of age? He escapes fifty funerals, fifty caskets, fifty obsequies, fifty awful wrenchings of the heart. It is hard enough for us to bear their departure, but is it not easier for us to bear their departure than for them to stay and bear fifty departures? Shall we not by the grace of God rouse ourselves into a generosity of bereavement which will practically say, "It is hard enough for me to go through this bereavement, but how glad I am that he will never have to go through it."

So I reason with myself, and so you will find it helpful to reason with yourselves. David lost his son. Though David was king he lay on the earth mourning and inconsolable for some time. At this distance of time, which do you really think was the one to be congratulated, the short-lived child, or the long-lived father? Had David died as early as that child died he would, in the first place, have escaped that particular bereavement, then he would have escaped the worse bereavement of Absalom his recreant son, and the pursuit of the Philistines, and the fatigues of his military campaign, and the jealousy of Saul, and the perfidy of Ahithophel, and the curse of Shimei, and the destruction of his family at Ziklag, and above all, he would have escaped the two great calamities of his life, the great sins of uncleanness and murder. David lived to be of vast use to the Church and the world, but so far as his own happiness was concerned, does it not seem to you that it would have been better for him to have gone early?

Now, this, my friends, explains some things that to you have been inexplicable. This shows you why when God takes little children from a household, he is very apt to take the brightest, the most genial, the most sympathetic, the most talented. Why? It is because that kind of nature suffers the most when it does suffer, and is most liable to temptation. God saw the tempest sweeping up from the Caribbean, and he put the delicate craft into the first harbor. "Taken away from the evil to come."

Again, my friends, there is a blessing in an abbreviated earthly existence in the fact that it puts one sooner in the centre of things. All astronomers, infidel as well as Christian, agree in believing that the universe swings around same great centre. Any one who has studied the earth and studied the heavens knows that God's favorite figure in geometry is a circle. When God put forth his hand to create the universe, he did not strike that hand at right angles, but he waved it in a circle and kept on waving it in a circle until systems and constellations and galaxies and all worlds took that motion. Our planet swinging around the sun, other planets swinging around other suns, but somewhere a great hub around which the great wheel of the universe turns. Now, that centre is heaven. That is the capital of the universe. That is the great metropolis of immensity.

Now, does not our common sense teach us that in matters of study it is better for us to move out from the centre toward the circumference, rather than to be on the circumference where our world now is? We are like those who study the American Continent while standing on the Atlantic beach. The way to study the continent is to cross it, or go to the heart of it. Our standpoint in this world is defective. We are at the wrong end of the telescope. The best way to study a piece of machinery is not to stand on the doorstep and try to look in, but to go in with the engineer and take our place right amid the saws and the cylinders. We wear our eyes out and our brain out from the fact we are studying under such great disadvantage. Millions of dollars for observatories to study things about the moon, about the sun, about the rings of Saturn, about transits and occultations and eclipses, simply because our studio, our observatory is poorly situated. We are down in the cellar trying to study the palace of the universe, while our departed Christian friends have gone upstairs amid the skylights to study.

Now, when one can sooner get to the centre of things, is he not to be congratulated? Who wants to be always in the Freshman Class? We study God in this world by the Biblical photograph of him; but we all know we can in five minutes of interview with a friend get more accurate idea of him than we can by studying him fifty years through pictures of words. The little child that died last night to-day knows more of God than all Andover, and all Princeton, and all New Brunswick and all Edinburgh, and all the theological institutions in Christendom. Is it not better to go up to the very headquarters of knowledge?

Does not our common sense teach us that it is better to be at the centre than to be clear out on the rim of the wheel, holding nervously fast to the tire lest we be suddenly hurled into light, and eternal felicity? Through all kinds of optical instruments trying to peer in through the cracks and the keyholes of heaven—afraid that both doors of the celestial mansion will be swung wide open before our entranced vision—rushing about among the apothecary shops of this world, wondering if this is good for rheumatism, and that is good for neuralgia, and something else is good for a bad cough, lest we be suddenly ushered into a land of everlasting health where the inhabitant never says, "I am sick."

If the spirit of this sermon is true, how consoled you ought to feel about members of your families that went early. "Taken from the evil to come," this book says. What a fortunate escape they had! How glad we ought to feel that they will never have to go through the struggles which we have had to go through. They had just time enough to get out of the cradle and run up the springtime hills of this world and see how it looked, and then they started for a better stopping-place.

And if the spirit of this sermon is true, then we ought not to go around sighing and groaning because another year has gone; but we ought to go down on one knee by the milestone and see the letters and thank God that we are 365 miles nearer home. We ought not to go around with morbid feelings about our health or about anticipated demise. We ought to be living not according to that old maxim which I used to hear in my boyhood, that you must live as though every day were the last; you must live as though you were to live forever, for you will. Do not be nervous lest you have to move out of a shanty into an Alhambra.

One Christmas morning, one of my neighbors, an old sea captain, died. After life had departed, his face was illuminated as though he were just going into harbor. The fact was he had already got through the "Narrows." In the adjoining room were the Christmas presents waiting for his distribution. Long ago, one night when he had narrowly escaped with his ship from being run down by a great ocean steamer, he had made his peace with God, and a kinder neighbor or a better man you would not find this side of heaven. Without a moment's warning, the pilot of the heavenly harbor had met him just off the light-ship. The captain often talked to me of the goodness of God, and especially of a time when he was about to go in New York harbor with his ship from Liverpool, and he was suddenly impressed that he ought to put back to sea. Under the protest of the crew and under their very threat, he put back to sea, tearing at the same time he was losing his mind, for it did seem so unreasonable that when they could get into harbor that night, they should put back to sea. But they put back to sea and the captain said to his mate, "You call me at ten o'clock at night." At twelve o'clock at night the captain was aroused and said: "What does this mean? I thought I told you to call me at ten o'clock, and here it is twelve." "Why," said the mate, "I did call you at ten o'clock, and you got up, looked around and told me to keep right on this same course for two hours, and then to call you at twelve o'clock." Said the captain, "Is it possible? I have no remembrance of that."

At twelve o'clock the captain went on deck, and through the rift of the cloud the moonlight fell upon the sea and showed him a shipwreck with one hundred struggling passengers. He helped them off. Had he been any earlier or any later at that point of the sea he would have been of no service to those drowning people. On board the captain's vessel they began to band together as to what they should pay for the rescue and what they should pay for the provisions. "Ah," says the captain, "my lads, you can't pay me anything: all I have on board is yours; I feel too greatly honored of God in having saved you to take any pay." Just like him! He never got any pay except that of his own applauding conscience. Oh, that the old sea captain's God might be my God and yours. Amid the stormy seas of this life may we have always some one as tenderly to take care of us as the captain took care of the drowning crew and the passengers.

CHRISTIAN HELP FOR COREAN SUFFERERS.

Mrs. W. J. Hall's Medical Missionary Work Among the Women in the City of Seoul, the Capital of Corea.

I have just received a letter from Dr. Rosetta Sherwood Hall, the devoted wife of Dr. W. J. Hall, the young physician who was trained in Dr. Geo. D. Dowkontt's Medical Missionary College in New York, and who went to Corea to preach the Gospel and heal the sick in that benighted land. Mrs. Hall's work, as we saw from her previous letter published in this journal on June 28, with a picture of the hospital over which she presides, is even more sorely needed than that of her husband, as Korean prejudice prevents the native woman being seen by a male physician, unless he belongs to her own family. Dr. Hall was thus powerless to help the women, but he is now doubly useful in the country through the services his wife renders. Mrs. Hall having laid the foundations of the work in Seoul, the capital of the country, during her three years' residence there, is now about to join her husband in his pioneer work in the interior, where he has been laboring in ever, often quite high ladies come to the hospital in closed chairs, a picture of one of these chairs taken from a photograph sent by Mrs. Hall appears on this page. A good proportion of the outcalls are made upon the higher class including several of the highest official families in the land. All patients hear more or less of the Gospel and many buy books and study for themselves.

Our daily services before dispensing have been more interesting than usual this year, as Miss Lewis has had more time to devote to them, and Mary Whoang, our new Korean matron having had a good training in our Girls' School, makes an efficient Bible woman. Next year Mary will keep record of the attendance upon these meetings as it no doubt is much larger than that of the dispensary, for often accompanying one patient will be two or three friends, or if the patient be from the official class there may be a half dozen servants with her. Miss Lewis has wisely had the entire Ross Catechism written in large plain characters all around the waiting-room, and this proves instructive to those who read, or sometimes one reads to the others who cannot. Upon an average, hardly one in five of my women patients can read their own native language.

I opened two new dispensaries this year, one at the East Gate, and one near the loneliness for a year. Her letter shows how arduous her labors must have been and what serious obstacles she has encountered. She will have to begin all over again at her new station, but she has the satisfaction of leaving the Seoul hospital in good hands and she goes forward to her new sphere full of faith and hope. Medical work there is evidently repulsive in many of its features, but the love of souls is a constraining power which makes all of whom it has taken possession, brave to bear and suffer and do for Christ's sake.

Mrs. Hall writes: The healing hand preparing the way for the saving Word continues to be an encouraging part of our work in Corea. At our annual meeting in 1892, I was reappointed in charge of the Woman's Hospital here in the capital of Corea—it is the first hospital for women in this country, and in it during the past year it has been my privilege to treat 6,260 cases. Of these 119 were cared for in the hospital wards, and the others were dispensary patients and patients treated in their homes. The aggregate number of cases treated during my three years here is over 14,000. The records show an increase the second year over the first, in round numbers of 1,500, and of the third year over the second of more than 2,000. Women and children from all classes of Coreans are included in these numbers, though, of course as it is not the custom for women of the higher classes to appear upon the streets, the majority are from the low class people. How-

South Gate of the city. The former is known as the Baldwin dispensary, named in honor of the lady who first gave toward woman's work in Corea. This place will in time prove a great blessing to the East side of the city, but it needs to have a doctor and a teacher living there. It is three miles across the city from the hospital. In going to this hospital I was always obliged to use a Korean chair or palanquin on account of the filth in the streets which is revolting to sight and smell. The streets have no sidewalks, and they serve as a common, open sewer for the city. Men may walk through them with impunity if they have strong stomachs, but no woman can bear the disgusting sights and smells which characterize the streets of the East side. She must lean back in her chair and close her eyes as she is carried along. Sometimes I close my eyes upon the squalid mud huts, and naked children, and imagine I am being borne swiftly along upon an elevated car to my work in a home city, but the odors, ever arising from the filthy streets, soon rudely awaken me from such day-dreams. How it has come about that the streets are so bad, I do not know, but I think the ancient custom forbidding the presence of women upon the street, has much to do with it. I wonder what would happen in our home-land if women were never to be seen upon the street?

I think I have told you before by the sad results that often follow treatment of the native doctor in Corea. This year, for the first time, I saw one of them at his work, and I will try to tell you about it. I was called one day to the house of one by the higher class to see a child who had become very sick two or three days before, after being carried a long distance, strapped to the back of his nurse, as is their custom: his bare head and the nape of his neck exposed to the fierce heat of a July sun. I found him in convulsions, and, after a careful examination, I told the father I feared there was little or no hope of his recovery. Both father and mother bowed before me, and begged me to "give life," as they express it. I told them, only God could do that; but we would do all that we could, and I left them medicines and the necessary directions, with the promise to return in the morning. Now, this child was the only son of these people, and no doubt their love for him was just as strong as that of fond American parents, and, like them, they wanted to leave nothing undone, that could be done for their darling. They had had the Korean doctor before they called me, but when they saw the child surely growing worse they thought they would try the foreign doctor, but as morning dawned with no improvement, they again sent for the Korean doctor, who arrived shortly after I did: the mother, and Esther, who accompanied me, had then to leave the room, as no Korean woman can see a man who does not belong to her own family. After examining the little boy, I told the father that he was dying—I could do no more for him, that God was surely going to take him very soon to his heavenly home. Then the father bade the Korean doctor to again try his skill. The first thing this doctor did, was to make a little pyramid of a brownish-looking powder upon each breast of the child, and then set it afire: as it began to burn the tender skin I begged the father to have it removed, and I said to the doctor, "You know it can do no good;" but he calmly smiled, as he obeyed the now almost frantic father, to go on with his treatment. He then took out from its sheath a needle—half-way between a surgeon's probe and a darning-needle in appearance—and this he proceeded to stick through each little foot, through the palms of the hands, the thumb-joints and through the lip into the jaw just beneath the nose. Again I tried to make him stop, but he said it was "Corean custom." I replied it is a very bad custom, that though in this case it would result in no further harm, as the child was dying, yet it was exceedingly cruel, and in cases where recovery from the disease might occur, inflammations of these punctured joints would be sure to follow, and often suppurate with death of the bones, so that amputation of a foot or a hand is the only radical cure. This explained the origin of many cases which I had been called on to treat in the hospital. The doctor and father now went out, and the mother and Esther came in. Esther had been telling her about our Father in heaven, and that her dear little son would be soon with him and be free from sickness and pain forevermore. The poor mother seemed anxious to learn all she could: we prayed with her and left for her to read the little tract called "Communion," or as it is translated into Korean, "Comforting Words." A few days later she sent a servant with the message that the child had died and was buried: she sent a little present to me with an invitation to visit her again. There are many doors open to receive us, but our workers are so few that we have not been able to enter them, except in a few cases, and these have been rewarded with much fruit each time—the mothers, grandmothers and children learning to read the Bible, to sing and pray, and those who could come out of their homes and attend the services have desired and received baptism.

Dr. Hall and I have both been appointed to Pyong Yang, a city of the Northern interior, 180 miles north of Seoul. Last year, Dr. Hall was the first to be appointed to work in the interior, and now I have the privilege of being the first woman appointed to similar work. As you can imagine, it is a little hard for me to give up the growing work in Seoul, and my Korean girl helpers, who have grown so dear to me in these three years; but it is a satisfaction to be able to leave all to the good care of Dr. Mary Cutler, our new doctor, who came to us last April, and of Miss Lewis, who has been here nearly two years now, while I am happy to go, and with our Father's help, to try to build up a similar work in the still darker city of Pyong Yang, known as the "Sodom of Corea."

Over and over, yes deeper and deeper, My heart is pierced through with life's sorrowing cry; But the tears of the sower and the songs of the reaper Shall mingle together in joy by and by.

ADAM'S SIN AND GOD'S GRACE.

S.S. Lesson for Jan. 14. Gen. 3: 1-15. Golden Text, I Cor. 15: 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"It is not good for the man to be alone," was a necessary conclusion from the very purpose of God in his creation: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." It was an absolute impossibility that one individual man could, in himself, resemble the unity of three in one. Therefore God's further purpose: "I will make him an helpmeet for him." [or R. V., "answering to him."] God formed man out of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." But God does not repeat himself, and, when he formed woman, he did it in a new way. First he brought to Adam all the animal world of his creation that he might name them, but among them all there was not found a helpmeet for him; the man was still "alone": none answering. And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof, and the rib, which the Lord God had taken from the man made her a woman, and brought her unto the man. No energy of man could make for him a helpmeet; it must be God's creative hand upon him while he slept. By virtue of the second Adam's sleep of death the recreative hand of God is forming, in his divine purposes, a help answering him, to the Lord Jesus Christ. Adam's welcome to his bride was: "This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman because she was taken out of man. Paul tells us (Eph. 5: 30): "We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones;" and the Lord Jesus says to the overcomer (Rev. 3: 12): "I will write upon him my new name."

God's masterpiece in his work of creation was accomplished: provision for his great purpose was made: "They [the two] shall be one flesh." It was God's first pledge of that unity which Jesus prayed for (John 17: 21). Adam and Eve were to be "one flesh;" Jew and Gentile "one new man." (Eph. 2: 15); the perfecting of the saints and the edifying of the body of Christ is to result in "a perfect man." (Eph. 4: 12, 13.) The Bride of Christ is to be "a chaste virgin." (II. Cor. 11: 2), always one out of many.

No wonder the jealousy of Satan, the fallen cherub, who was "in Eden the garden of God." (Ezek. 28: 12-17) was stirred up against beings who were, from the beginning, destined to represent, to be like, and finally to be united to God. There was no inherent sin in man; he was pronounced not only "good," but "very good" in the day of his creation. But in his very individuality there was the principle of self, the laying down of which must make the oneness which God sought for in his created creatures. If Satan could sow disunion between God and Adam, and between Adam and Eve, God's purpose would be frustrated, and sin would become a terrible possibility. Man must be put to a test, he was no mere machine, and Satan was on the watch to profit by it. He knew the glory of an unfallen state, he had "walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire." Not his malicious heart, in its awful restlessness, followed its terrible instinct of dragging others into his own ruin.

Do not despise the powers of Satan. The archangel Michael, who surely knew more about him than we do "durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said: The Lord rebuke thee." Jude 9. Thank God, Christ through death, destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and in Christ we always find him our overcome foe. But let us beware how we attempt to meet the devil in any spirit of boasting. If he could overcome our first parents when they were sinless, he can make an easy prey of those who were born in sin, if we are not shielded and kept at all points hidden in Christ. "They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony," and they loved not their lives unto death."

He came to sow doubt: "Yea, hath God said: Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden;" he came to the woman, to the weaker one, it was like him; he addressed himself to the selfish instinct. Eve's vocation was to be an helpmeet for her husband, "one flesh" possessing a unity of interests with him. In faithfulness to her vocation, she should not have listened to, and above all, not have answered an inferior being, over which God had given man dominion; and above all, she should have consulted Adam before doing so. God had given to them both only one test of their obedience. Eve neither consulted God nor yet her husband: created to depend on both, she acted in independence, she listened to the serpent, because she liked to listen; she yielded to self interest, and so became disloyal to God. She answered the serpent because she liked it. Thus her self life, her human will, conceived the unbelief suggested by the serpent, and "lust (or human self will), when it hath conceived bringeth forth sin." Thus "sin entered into the world, and death by sin." Having gone thus far, it was an easy step onward. Eve's answer to the serpent was neither more nor less than the exact truth; the sin was in answering him at all. "Resist the devil and he will flee from you" (James 4: 7): don't answer him.

Having got her ear, the devil began to show his colors: "Ye shall not surely die, for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." Poor Eve, she was now in a dilemma. Hitherto only God had spoken to his children, and Eve had believed in and loved him; now she began to mistrust and suspect God; if the serpent was right, another, a shorter and an easier way of becoming like God lay open to her. Again acting independently of God and of her husband, Eve consulted her own self-life; she "saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat, and gave also to her husband with her, and he did eat." The root of all the lust of sensual gratification which has borne fruit in drunkenness, gluttony, and other fleshly sins, had already found its place in man, whom God had previously pronounced "very good." The foundation of all that "lust of the eyes and pride of life" which has led man to glorify himself instead of his Maker, was laid then. A death had taken place; all in man which could apprehend God had died, he was become flesh!

Man was fallen; and very soon his fall was manifest. In the quiet cool of the evening, a well known Presence was in the garden, and they who alone of all the creation were made in the image of God, now fled from before him, and sought some hiding place, anything to get away from God! It is the sure test of the true state of a soul; whether he wants to have to do with God himself, or whether he stops short in ceremonial, doctrine, Christian activity or anything short of face to face dealing with God. It is the instinct of one who is really alive unto God to thirst after him; where this thirst does not exist something is really wrong; perhaps everything is wrong.

But God's voice must be heard: he called unto Adam: "Where art thou?" "I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid myself." "Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat?" Adam was driven into a corner, he had disobeyed; would he confess? "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree and I did eat." It was true, but it was unmanly. The two who were to represent God by their union were saying bitter things against each other. Faith, uprightness, love vanished. God made man upright, but the serpent nature had infected fallen man already! "And the Lord God said unto the woman: What is this that thou hast done?" "The serpent beguiled me and I did eat." O how readily excuses for sin formed themselves in the mind of fallen man! Man had become a ruin; like the earth before God's creating hand work-upon it, his moral nature was "without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

But did God abandon his purpose? Never; he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, and therefore before the fall that his purpose may be accomplished, he cursed the serpent.

ANCIENT TABLET OF TREE OF LIFE

HERE is a mystery in the verses which form the subject of the day's lesson that has never been penetrated. It involves the origin of evil and the question of why God permitted sin to enter the universe. After all the study and all the argument that have been spent on the question, we are as much in the dark as ever. Our experience of ourselves and our observation of others convince us that man is not all that he is capable of and that there is in his nature a streak of evil that not only debases him, but cripples him and restricts his power. If we met, in some shelter for tramps, a man in ragged clothing, torn and penniless, who had about him the manner and bearing of a gentleman, refined in language and with a knowledge of languages and the sciences, we should say that he had seen better days. It is precisely so with the whole human race. Mentally and spiritually, men bear the marks of a higher estate than that they now occupy. It may be that those marks are relics of past greatness or they may be the promise of future greatness. Perhaps they are both. Of one thing we are sure and that is that the cause of his present depression is sin. From the most ancient times there has been a tradition of some great moral catastrophe in the world. It appears in various forms in the various mythologies, but in the East it was evidently the one which, purified from polytheism, appears in the Bible. On an ancient Babylonian tablet so old that Moses may have looked upon it, there is a rude drawing of a tree, with a male and female figure and a talking serpent, evidently illustrating the Babylonian idea of the temptation and fall. Another tablet has also been found, of which we give a copy, with a drawing of a different tree, guarded by winged figures, which is doubtless a representation of the tree of life which is mentioned in Genesis 3: 24.

Whether one regards the incident as history, or as one of the parables, which the Bible writers so often used to convey truth, the spiritual lesson is the same. That lesson is that man deliberately chose the evil; he preferred what was pleasant to what was right, and he has had to bear the consequences ever since. It is so now. Let a boy always seek pleasure and play instead of hard study, and he inevitably suffers. When he becomes a man he falls behind in the race, because he is not equipped with knowledge. We tell the boy of the consequences of his folly; we do not remove from him the possibility of his committing it, because it is essential for his future manliness that he should learn to resist temptation; but we expect him to heed the warning, just as we tell a child if he touches the fire he will be burned. If he, like Eve, sees that the thing is pleasant to the eyes, and a thing to be desired, and chooses to indulge himself in spite of the warning, he must bear the consequences. He may blame his parents or teachers, as Adam indirectly blamed God when he said "the woman that thou gavest me she gave me of the tree," but he has to suffer for his folly. The picture is true to life, whether we construe the tree, the fruit and the talking serpent as actual fact, or, like the images in Ezekiel, Daniel and the Revelation, as symbols of other things.

Ye shall not touch it lest ye die. Denton the traveller describes a tree known as the Judas tree from its deadly treacherous beauty. Its blossoms come before its leaves and are of a rich crimson color. The gorgeous beauty of the flowers attracts innumerable insects and the wandering bee goes to it to gather honey. But every bee and insect that alights on it imbibes poison and drops dead. All around beneath the branches of the tree the ground is covered with the bodies of the little victims of its fascinations.

Their eyes were opened. That is the effect of sin. It is no pleasure to know good and evil. The knowledge of evil is disappointing as well as damaging. A traveler tells an incident that is typical of this knowledge he says: It was a remarkably hot and sultry day. We were scrambling up the mountain which rises above the east shore of the Dead Sea, when I saw before me a fine plum-tree loaded with fresh, blooming plums. I cried to my fellow-traveller, "Now, then, who will arrive first at the plum-tree?" And as he caught a glimpse of so refreshing an object, we both pressed our horses into a gallop to see which should get the first plum from the banches. We both arrived at the same time, and each, snatching a fine ripe plum, put it at once into our mouths, when on biting it, instead of the cool, delicious, juicy fruit which we expected, our mouths were filled with a dry, bitter dust; and we sat under the tree upon our horses, sputtering and hemming, and doing all we could to be relieved of the nauseous taste of this strange fruit. We then perceived that we had discovered the famous apple of the Dead Sea, the existence of which has been doubted.

I heard thy voice and I was afraid. William Moodie in his excellent work "Tools for Teachers" tells an incident of the effect of conscience on a dog. The owner of the dog was entering his dining-room on which the remains of dinner were lying on the table, when he saw his favorite skye terrier longingly regarding a cutlet. He waited and watched and saw the dog jump on a chair nearer to the coveted meat and put his forepaws on the edge of the table. Then he sniffed at it once or twice, hesitated a moment and at last took it. He ran with it under a lounge. Then the gentleman entered and sat down watching the dog from behind his newspaper curious to see how he would act. The dog looked at him furtively evidently expecting punishment but the gentleman neither spoke nor moved. But all the flavor of the cutlet seemed to have departed. The conscience-stricken terrier was not eating it. He looked around piteously several times and seemed utterly miserable. No word was spoken, but the dog's better nature conquered. He crawled from his hiding place, laid the cutlet at his master's feet and slunk away.

I hid myself. Adam could not have known much of God to have attempted so impossible a thing. But people still make the attempt. Professor Phelps tells the story of a burglar who broke into an unoccupied dwelling and stripped it of the valuables it contained. When the owners returned they found that he had gone leisurely through the upper rooms and had brought his plunder to the parlor where he packed it up for removal. There were signs of his having sat down there to rest and eat. On a bracket in that room there was a statuette of "Ecce Homo,"—Christ crowned with thorns. The burglar had taken it up—the marks of his dirty fingers were still upon it—and had turned it around with its face to the wall. He had not been able to bear to have even the sightless eyes of the marble image of the Saviour bent on his deeds of infamy.

The woman that thou gavest. Adam was indirectly reproaching God. Man is always disposed to throw the blame on some one for his own sin. Spurgeon used to tell a story of a drunken sailor who returning to his lodgings one night, in Venezuela, had great difficulty in finding the house, and his room in it. Having accomplished this, he tried in vain to get his boots off. After many fruitless efforts he lay down with them on. "Well," said he, "it must be the climate. I have been all the world over and I never had it happen before that I could not get my boots off. I have lived in Jamaica, Brazil, Spain, and here and there in Africa, but never, until now, have I been in such an abominable climate as this, where I have to go to bed with my boots on." Not so ridiculously foolish, but with a like lack of perception of the situation are those who lay the responsibility for their evil deeds on their constitution, or their circumstances.

UP THE MEDITERRANEAN.

Our Traveler Describes the Discomforts of a P. & O. Voyage—Scenes at Port Said—Cemetery Musings—A Talkative Guide—The first Glimpse of Palestine—A Glorified Pilgrim—At Jaffa.

WE had expected to rough it at some, and probably, at several periods of our journeyings. We had not expected that the process would begin upon one of the far-famed steamers of the Peninsular and Oriental line, plying between England, Australia and India. Perhaps we were unreasonable in comparing "The Coromandel," on which we took passage from Marseilles, with the floating palaces that make an Atlantic voyage endurable to the least sea-worthy tourist. Certain it is that the P. & O. craft suffered grievously by the contrast. The table was little better than that of a second-class boarding-house; the appointments of the state-rooms—"cabins" as they are called by the English—were mean and uncomfortable, the dining-saloon so narrow and dark as to make meals a penitential process.

Added to these drawbacks to the comfort of the voyagers, was the circumstance that the Mediterranean was in a bad humor, and so maltreated us that three-quarters of the land-farers on board were wretchedly ill, until we were flung, as it were, into the Straits of Messina, and, under the lee of Sicily, glided into the blue placidity of what, for the first time since our embarkation, deserved the name of a "summer sea." It kept up this reputation to the end of our voyage—the harbor of Port Said, at the mouth of the Suez Canal. There we discovered, to our chagrin, that the steamer which was to have taken us on up to Beyrout upon the day succeeding our arrival, was detained—nobody knew where—in quarantine—nobody knew for what—and no other would sail within four days. The town is drearily modern, cheaply built as an entry-port to the canal, upon a low-lying sand-bank.

Before we had been an hour in the "Hotel Continental," we made the discovery that there was not a woman-employee in the house, a fact oddly contrasted with those that formed the basis of my last letter. Our beds were made, our rooms swept and dusted, and all other functions of chambermaid performed by men, brown of face, black-eyed, and arrayed in a mongrel costume of jacket, blue blouse and trousers. They moved quickly and quietly, they answered the bell promptly and were the very soul of civility. Recalling certain experiences in what we used to call, "the waiter-girl belt," of the Western States, and the deliberate indifference, sometimes verging upon sullenness, of the "young ladies out at service" in the Middle and Eastern sections of our free and enlightened land, we confessed that the chamberman system has notable advantages.

During our first stroll through the little town, we wondered where all the women who must wive the men and mother the boys thronging the streets, kept themselves.

Except for an occasional French, or English, or American, in bonnet, jacket and gown of European birth or descent, we met not one representative of "the dominant sex" of my former letter. On the next day, we took one of the few carriages that are a discord in the Oriental tone of the region, and, accompanied by a swarthy dragoman from the hotel, drove through the native quarter. Women were there, in number and variety sufficient to quiet our speculations. They sat flat in the doors of the houses, or upon the ground against the outer walls of the same, knitting, tending babies and gossiping; they stirred messes in brass pots over braziers of charcoal, and made coffee for men who sat cross-legged upon the bare earth to drink it; they sold beads, sweetmeats, sausages, uninviting vegetables and less attractive fruit—apples, dates and lemons—at stalls set right in the street. However engaged, they were covered up to the eyes in a sort of combination-suit of circular cloak, hood and Making way slowly through the motley crowds of the native quarter, our coachman and dragoman yelling incessantly to the pedestrians to clear the roads, and the whip of the driver doing sharp execution upon the bare legs of innumerable boys and lads whose brown bodies were covered to the knee by a single garment, half-trock, half-trousers—we at length escaped from din and dinginess and a nameless and altogether nauseous mixture of vile odors, into an open roadway, laid along the water's edge to the cemetery, two miles from the town. To secure this roadway, a curbing of solid stone was laid on both sides, the space between being filled with earth and sand. After leaving the outskirts of Port Said, there were no signs of human habitation except a few scattered hovels, dotting the waste on our left. About the doors small black pigs rooted and squealed; a stray dog skulked in the forlorn hope of a supper, and toward our three camels, with outstretched noses, followed their masters. We watched them kneel to be unloaded, and then remain quiet on the sand for their nightly rest. The only symptom of vegetation, as far as eye could reach, was in clumps of something we mistook for beach-grass, until the dragoman plucked a branch for our inspection, and we found it strangely succulent, with fleshy leaves and even small yellow berries, ovate and pulpy.

Right in the middle of this desert, arose the walls of the cemeteries—the Christian, devoted to the interment of French Roman Catholics and Egyptian Copts, and the Moslem, where lie "the faithful" of whatever nationality. We looked in the first, see-feet. Leading the way to the outermost row of graves, the guide pointed to a line of freshly-heaped mounds, to the headboards of which were tied shabby bunches of palm-leaves, palm-branches and artificial flowers.

"If you had been here this morning," he explained in execrable French enlivened by insupportable English, "you would have seen two thousand women—perhaps more, maybe less—here, crying, and crying, and crying, and telling how good her husband was, or her child was so sweet, or how she mourned her father or her sister, or her brother, and did break her heart for her mother, died so long ago. They come so, every Friday, and cry just the same and ever so hard, and it is they who do this"—pointing to the newer mounds. "These are they who were buried of late, you comprehend, and the ladies, they keep them high until the boards go about them,—so they be not blown away by the sea-wind—you comprehend?"

Friday is the Moslem Sabbath, and this pious pilgrimage is a duty to be performed upon the holy day. Hearing the tale, we looked with different eyes upon the sandy heaps raised by pitying hands; the already withering memorials lashed to the main headboards, had meaning and poetry. The woman-heart is the same, the world around,

At the end of the row of new mounds, was an open grave. "When is this to be filled?" I asked, knowing that burial in this tropical country follows with awful rapidity upon death, and supposing that the pit was dug purposely for somebody.

The dragoman shrugged his shoulders.

"Ah! who can know? It may be to-morrow; it may be next week. But there is always one ready. Somebody must come to fill it, some day. You comprehend?"

Comprehend! ah, but too well! That also, was an old, old story, known wherever men and women live and die.

Heaven forbid that we, or any of our blood, should ever die at Port Said!

I was awakened this morning, after a night's voyage upon the still pacing Mediterranean, by a voice outside my cabin, vibrant with emotion, hardly repressed:

"Have we reached Joppa?"

"In an hour, madame!"

Peeping beyond the edge of my door, I saw a woman gazing through an open port-hole with an expression that sent me to my own window. The east was flushed and golden in welcome to the coming sun; the sea dimpled with smiles; at the meeting of sky and water lay a dark irregular line of hills. It was my first glimpse of the Holy Land—and beautiful exceedingly! Yet, presently, I went back for another glance at my neighbor's face. Unconscious of possible scrutiny, her eyes were still fixed upon the horizon-line, and soul and thought went with them. She may have been fifty years of age, she was thin in face and figure, and plain-featured. She may have been a Yankee school-mistress or an English ex-governess. Something in her air forbade the supposition that she was illiterate or underbred; under the rushing association of the scene, the commonplace visage was glorified. In spirit she was on her knees before the altar of the hills, behind which gleamed the flame of a new day. I knew as surely as if she had broken into a Magnificat, that, like myself, she had longed through years for this hour, that nothing in human language could voice aright the emotions swelling her heart to actual pain.

Whatever may be the degree of dissimulation which many well-meaning people predict for us in our pilgrimage, I shall always be thankful that I met in that still hour, in spirit, the simple devoutness I read in the face of a stranger whose name I shall never know, and who will never suspect my reverent sympathy with her mood.

veil, usually black, and of some opaque material. It is picturesque, and, after the manner of many other picturesque costumes, it must be inconvenient and unpleasant, especially in a country where the thermometer in December, ranges at noon from seventy-three to ninety-six in the shade. How a native woman, thus muffled up and swathed, can discharge even the few domestic duties incumbent upon one who, as we have seen, lives and keeps house mainly in the open air—is a hopeless puzzle to the foreign observer. That nothing may be lacking from the discomfort of mantle, wimple and veil, our Arabian, or Egyptian, or Syrian matron wears, in token of her honorable estate of wedlock, a brass tube, nearly an inch in diameter, strapped perpendicularly upon her forehead directly between her eyebrows and in a line with the bridge of her nose. Close scrutiny showed us the black string attached to one end and losing itself in the close black hood which forms the upper part of the mantle; how it was attached to the veil below, is still to us an Oriental enigma. Through this pipe, Mahomet, or some other Moslem authority in spiritual matters, is supposed to breathe admonition, counsel and consolation as the married devotee requires it.

ing nothing very different from the tall crosses and head-stones hung with tawdry immortelles and beads, such as we had beheld in dozens of other foreign burial-grounds. We alighted at the gate of the Moslem cemetery and entered the enclosure. Arid sand for many feet downward is the substance through which the graves are sunk. Within a few days after the mound is heaped above the sleeper below, the meeting winds of sea and desert, tear it down and whirl the sand to the four quarters of the enclosure. Hence, as soon as may be, a box, of the shape and size of the grave, is fitted over it. When the relatives can afford it, a structure of similar form in cement takes the place of the wooden case. Upon box and cement are written the names of the deceased and texts from the Koran. Above many of the rude tombs arise coo-like constructions, with trellised sides and tops, within which stand pots of dwarf palms, of cacti, geraniums, and once in a great while, of sickly vines, pathetic to behold in a region where rain does not fall for months together, and water is sold to the poor by the jar or skinful.

There are no regular walks or avenues, and wherever the graves were not protected by boxes, the sand bore the imprint of many

POST-MORTEM FIGHTS.

DURING the past few years there has been, as you will have noticed, a large increase of testamentary quarrels. The orphan courts are filled with combat. The last wills and testaments of people in all circumstances are in dispute. There seems to be an epidemic on the subject. Never have there been so many attempts to break these sacred documents. Sometimes the charge is of over-influence, sometimes insanity, sometimes imbecility of old age, sometimes forgery, and it is really getting to be a serious question whether it is possible for one to bequeath his property in such a way that he shall be sure of its destination. This is a subject that demands serious and Christian consideration. You will, if having families and worthy of them, make your last testament. Some of these documents, already made, need reconstruction. Do not any of you be guilty of the superb folly of constructing the phraseology of your own will. "Every man his own doctor" is the theory whose chief value is the rapid disposal of lots in Greenwood. "Every man his own lawyer," has its chief value in making fools of testators and beggars of their bereft families. The mistaken effect of a word has sent many a property in a direction different from that which the dying man intended. The testator saved twenty or a hundred dollars by penning his own last will, but it cost his family their home, or a benevolent institution its rightful inheritance. Tear up your self-made wills and to-morrow employ an attorney to furnish a substitute. Above all, pray to God to help in the disposal of your property. Let not the stereotyped beginning of the document be a mockery, but a pious imploration: "In the name of God, Amen. I, being of sound mind and body, do make public this my last will and testament." First of all let your wife have at least her third, and your children share and share alike. That family is awfully asked where a child receives more than a wife. When a man takes a wife she ought to be to him a queen, first in every ambition and first in every provision, and when a man does not act in that way, I conclude either that he is cursed with a very poor wife, or she is cursed with a very mean husband. The one-third spoken of in the law is none too much for one who has by her counsel and household economy helped build your estate, and hunted up your lost articles of apparel, and sat up until midnight waiting for you to come home from the political meeting or the club house. In nine cases out of ten, the wife has as much to do with achieving the fortune as the husband. Then let your children share and share alike. The worst family feuds are created by inequalities of inheritance. It is often the case that one of the family coddles the old gentleman in his last days, turns up his coat collar and runs the fingers through the gray locks, saying: "How fine they look," and all with reference to the inheritance. In many cases I have observed that most of the property went to the one who was busy in such offices, and great injustices went to the other members of the household, and a wedge struck through the family peace from generation to generation. Partiality is a sin against God as well as your children, excepting in those cases where through physical or mental defect it is evident that the child will be less able to help itself. In that case, let there be more inheritance rather than less. If your children start life with two hands and two feet and a healthy brain they have a fortune to begin with: but look out for those who enter the battle of life already maimed, and make special provision for them. If there be any favoritism, let them have it.

BLESSING OF BOOKS.

WHO thanks God as he ought for books? To some of them we go in our grief, others we take down from the shelf in our joy. We know their faces well in the light, and we would know them in the darkness by a touch. We have read some of them until the leaves are turned down and the pictures are faded and the binding is loose, yet we would not, because of the scarification, part with them any more than we would cast off our friends, because in our service the rose has dropped from the cheek or the elasticity from the limb. Let a stranger's hand deface, or borrow without intending to return, or stealthily put back on the shelf some day when we are absent, our favorite book, maltreated and befuddled, how hard it is to keep the door of our lips shut. What truth, what joy, what mirth, what salvation have come streaming down into our soul through the bright channel of books. Taking the hand of travelers in their books, we go the world over on a tour of discovery and pleasure and exploration—through Central Africa with Livingstone, through Spain with Borrow, through Asia Minor with Stanley and Thompson, through Portugal with Baillie, through Hindostan with Malcom, through China with Gutziaff, through South America with Humboldt, through Arctic climes with Dr. Kane, through Russia with Henderson, through Norway, Corsica and Algeria with S. S. Cox; and from mountains of eternal snow we gather the crystal, and from climes of perpetual summer we inhale the cactus, and in far distant isles we walk under the groves of orange and pomegranate and citron. Through books we pluck the plume from rarest bird, and gather from our herb-arium the rarest plant, and catch for our aquarium strangest fins, and decipher the hieroglyphics of oldest monument. The whole world, with its mountains and its seas and its empires and its civilization, is heaped upon the parlor table, without traveler's pack or dusty diligence or foreign passport; yea, in our slippers and our gowns, we make the tremendous pilgrimage; or smitten with curiosity to know of other centuries, we halt not at the barrier of years, but taking the hand of historians in their books, we walk through the palace of ancient kingdoms and hear the eloquence of ancient forum and catch the din and the fury and the clangor of ancient battle. With Daubigny and Milman and Neander we study the vicissitudes of the church, her thrilling victories and ghastly martyrdoms, Gibbon and Allison and Thiers and Macaulay and Robertson making to pass in vivid review the glory and the power and the shame and the atrocity of ages that otherwise would have been forgotten; or, on the wings of the poet, there is no height of sentiment, or imagery, or sublimity which we cannot ascend, while Milton and Cowper and Spenser and Poe and Bryant and Longfellow pour into our soul all that is sweet in pastoral and pensive in elegy, and rapturous in lyric, and enlivening in ballad, and melodious in good rhythm. Thus, on two or three books of poetry we do what the ancients could not accomplish without piling Ossa upon Pelion—we scale the heavens. Or, if we are anxious to discover our duty as citizens and patriots, we give ourselves to the study of such immortal works as Story's "Commentaries on the Constitution," or Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," or DeToqueville's "Democracy in America." Whatever may be a man's wealth and renown, he is a pauper if he has never learned by his own experience the advantages and pleasures of books. Morning, noon and night thank God for books. Let us be in sympathy with everything that honors American literature.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

C. S. What is meant by the shortness of the bed and the narrowness of the covering in Isa. 28: 20?

A reference to a Hebrew proverb expressing insufficiency. The confidence of the rulers was put in a resource inadequate to the need, and which would fail when put to the test.

C. G., Seattle, Wash. In The History of Human Marriage, Westermarck claims, at the time of his writing, that to a great extent, Christianity abolished the sale of wives among the different tribes of the earth. Are there tribes to-day who buy their wives with horses, cattle, etc., and if so, how many?

In both Asia and Africa there are tribes that still follow this custom. See Dr. Johnston's Missionary work, "Reality vs. Romance," published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York; also any good encyclopedia. Christianity has abolished this practice in many places where it formerly prevailed.

J. K. S., Landisville, Pa. Is the command to wash the feet of the brethren (John 13: 14) binding at the present time?

The spirit of the command is perpetually binding and it may be manifested in many ways. He who has his Master's spirit will shrink from no service, however humble, if his brethren have need of it. He would wash their feet if that were their chief need, but in our day their most urgent need is of other kinds. When you know a brother is hungry or unable to pay his rent you would show more of the Master's spirit by feeding him or helping him with his rent than by washing his feet.

A. Austin Vredenburg, New Paltz, N. Y. In Dr. Talmage's sermon, published in your Christmas issue, he speaks of Paul as going to Damascus on horseback. What is his authority for the statement?

It is a reasonable inference, and is so regarded by Bible commentators, that Saul and his band, while making their rapid journey on a special mission from Jerusalem to Damascus, travelled on horseback, the distance being somewhat less than two hundred miles. Troops going even much shorter distances, were generally mounted, (see Acts 23: 23.) The travel along the caravan route between the two cities was of three kinds: on horseback, on camel-back, or on asses.

"Constant Reader," Waco, Tex. 1. At what period of the Christian life may an earnest seeker after sanctification expect the blessing? 2. When Dr. Talmage stated in an editorial recently that the man does not live who does not commit sin, was he aware that in 1. John 3: 5-10 the statement is made that "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin"?

1. He may expect the process to begin immediately, and the more earnestly he seeks and strives after it, the more rapid will his progress be. The beginning is miraculous at his new birth. The seed implanted within him—the divine life, grows, causes him to hate sin and avoid it. In proportion as he yields himself to this sanctifying power, he will grow in grace and go on growing to his dying day. He is not made perfect miraculously and in a moment, but has to fight the battle with sin in his members (see Romans 7: 18-23). The Apostle when far on in the Christian life said "not as though I were already perfect." 2. The passage does not contradict Dr. Talmage's statement. The new nature to which the Apostle John refers does not commit sin. Being born of God, it sinneth not, but while it is in the flesh it does not obtain complete command of the man. You will see the distinction clearly explained in Romans 7: 15-18, part of which runs, "Now then, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me." The man has in him the divine nature, pure and good, but the old nature frequently leads him into sin in spite of it. You will find that when anyone boasts that he is living without sin, that those about him do not often confirm his statement.

Subscriber, Greenville, N. I. Why do Christians observe the first day as the Sabbath instead of the Seventh?

They observe the first day in commemoration of Christ's resurrection, which was the culminating event in the inauguration of the new dispensation under which we live. It is not observed as the Jewish Sabbath, a day of absolute quiescence, but as a day of spiritual activity in Christ's cause. The Jewish Sabbath, if observed at all, should logically be observed according to Jewish law, which forbade a man carrying a pail of water to a thirsty animal, forbade him lighting a fire and many other things. Christ rebelled against it and broke the law by healing the sick on that day, opening the eyes of the blind and excused his disciples when they plucked the ears of corn. It is certain that the early Christians observed the first day of the week, calling it not the Sabbath, but the Lord's Day. Justin Martyr, in 140, wrote that it was the regular day for the breaking of bread.

"The Teaching of the Apostles," believed to have been written about the end of the first century, explicitly speaks of it as the day of meeting, and we infer from Acts 20: 7, that the practice was observed in Apostolic times. The Jewish Christians and unbelievers, appear to have tried to bring the Church under the old law, but Paul bade the Christians pay no heed to them and let no man judge them in respect to the Sabbath. (Col. 2: 16). It is also worthy of notice, that when in the great Apostolic Council conditions were made as to the admission of Gentiles (Acts 15: 23-29), the observance of the Sabbath was not among them; which indicates that these inspired men did not regard the Jewish Sabbath as any longer a day which it was necessary to observe.

"Reader," Topeka, Kans. 1. Whom did Cain marry? We read of his marrying but not of there being an woman in the world beside his mother, Eve. 2. Where was the Land of Nod?

1. The believer in the literal truth and historical accuracy of the Bible narrative can accept no other solution than that Cain married his sister. Although the narrative does not mention the birth of daughters to Adam and Eve, the existence of Cain's wife cannot be accounted for in any other way, consistent with the historical truth of the Bible narrative, than the assumption that daughters were born to the first pair. 2. There is no means of identifying the land of Nod, as the only clue we have is that it is east of Eden. The word means "flight," and Nod may have simply been the land of Cain's flight.

C. C. Carroll, Kansas City, Kans. What disposition is made of the spirit after death? Does it sleep in the grave until the resurrection or does it at once enter into its eternal abode?

The only reliable source of information on the subject is the Bible and it gives no explicit answer to your questions. There are, however, several passages which bear on the subject. Christ's parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16: 22-31), implies a conscious existence immediately after death. His assurance to the penitent thief (Luke 23: 43) was to a like effect, although not so strongly if, as some scholars insist, the comma should be placed after the word "day" instead of after the word "thee." Another ground for believing that the soul does not sleep in the grave, is the appearance of Moses on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17: 3). But to our mind the strongest evidence is the remark of the Apostle Paul, that he had a desire to depart and to be with Christ (Phil. 1: 23). So active and earnest a worker would have had no such desire if he had expected that his soul would slumber in the grave until the resurrection.

Edward Brown, Grand Rapids, Mich.: 1. Which is the spiritual mode of baptism—immersion or sprinkling? 2. Are there any scriptures permitting infants to be baptized, or should the rite be administered only to adult believers? 3. If a Christian has not been baptized in infancy, is it his duty to be baptized?

1. Your question cannot be answered categorically. If it could, we should not find sincere, pious and learned men appearing on opposite sides on the question. The advocates of immersion believe as sincerely that their mode is the scriptural one, as the advocates of sprinkling believe that their mode is scriptural. This, too, notwithstanding that the question has been argued for centuries, and all the light shed upon it that learning and research could bring. It would take several pages of this journal to present fairly the arguments on both sides, but any Baptist or Congregational minister is able to make you acquainted with them. You must decide for yourself as to their merits, and if you do so honestly and intelligently, you need have no fear of consequences. 2. This also is a disputed question. The advocates of infant baptism base their position on the view of baptism as a dedication of the infant to God, and on the statement that the Apostle baptized the households of believers, when there is no evidence that any but the head of the household believed (see Acts 16: 15, 33, etc.). 3. Unquestionably a duty. No Christian should neglect the explicit command of his Lord.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE EARTHQUAKE IN PERSIA.

APPALLING loss of life has been caused by the earthquake, brief news of which was cabled recently from Teheran, the capital of Persia. The shocks were felt most severely at a town named Kushan on the north-eastern frontier of Persia. There was a succession of shocks for six consecutive days. The first overturned the highest buildings and weakened the others, which the later shocks completely destroyed. There was a population of about twenty thousand before the disturbance, and of these it is reported officially that no less than twelve thousand have been killed. If these figures are correct, it was the most destructive earthquake of this century. No such loss of life has been recorded since the great earthquake of Lisbon in November 1755 when over fifty thousand persons perished. Reports from Meshed a hundred miles to the south-east of Kushan say that the earthquake was felt there although but slightly. The people of Meshed had been sending supplies of food to the survivors at Kushan who were encamped in tents outside the town. Not a single house remained standing and the whole town was a heap of ruins. No less than one hundred and sixty distinct shocks had been counted in six days. The villages for seven miles around Kushan had also suffered, many buildings being destroyed and the inhabitants buried in the ruins. Kushan was the chief town in a broad and fertile valley near the Russian Transcaspian frontier. Its chief industry was the making of bricks. A picture of the town as it was before the disaster appears on this page which shows the long line of primitive brick-kilns in the foreground. The people are said to be in sore need of food and shelter. As many of them are likely to die of hunger and cold they must also be in urgent need of someone to teach them that lesson which Christ based on such sudden calamities as the one through which they have just passed: Think ye that those who perished were sinners above others because they suffered such things? Nay but except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish. (Luke 13: 2, 3.)

Strange use of a Bible.

Two condemned murderers made an unsuccessful attempt to escape from the jail at Princess Anne, Md., a few days ago. Shortly after midnight the jailer was aroused by cries of fire from the cell in which the murderers were confined. As they were known to be desperate characters, the jailer summoned assistance before opening the door of their cell. By that time it was so full of smoke that the inmates were almost suffocated. They were found lying unconscious on the floor. They were dragged out and soon recovered consciousness. It then occurred to the jailer that there must have been foul play, as the men had been heavily manacled and an iron chain attached their fetters to staples in the floor of the cell. An examination showed that the leg-irons had been filed apart. The men confessed that after thus getting free of their manacles, they had set their bed-clothing on fire, expecting that the jailer would open the door of their cell, when they would rush out, overpower him and make their escape. The long wait that ensued while the jailer procured assistance frustrated their plans, as they were overcome by the smoke before the door was opened. They said that the fine steel saws and files with which they had severed their fetters had been sent to them by a confederate outside, who concealed them in the binding of a Bible which he had sent in for their use. It is a pity that the Bible was used, as it so often is, to divert suspicion from wicked designs. Had they put it to its proper use they might have learned from its teachings what would have been infinitely more valuable to them—how to break the manacles of sin wherewith their souls were shackled. (II. Pet. 2: 9.)

A Surveyor's Blunder.

A real-estate owner in New York made a discovery recently which surprised her and has caused a great deal of perplexity to several persons. She is a New Jersey lady who does not often come to New York. About five years ago, she purchased a vacant lot in the Northern part of the city. Since then, she has paid taxes on it, but did not go to see it. Being in the city recently she went up to look at her vacant lot and to her amazement saw a fine four-story true order in such building is that which Paul commended as an example to the Corinthians, "They first gave their own selves to the Lord." (II. Cor. 8: 5.)

An Undesirable Immigrant.

Among the cabin passengers on the "New York" which arrived at New York a few days ago were two young men of German nationality. They were singled out by the detective who accompanied the custom-house inspector when he met the steamer down the bay, and were told that they must not leave the vessel with the other cabin passengers, but remain behind with the immigrants in the steerage for the inspection of the immigration officer. As they were evidently men of education and position, and had made themselves agreeable on the voyage, the order of the officer caused some surprise among the passengers. The detective declined to listen to the protests against his action and remained on board to see that the young men obeyed. When they were confronted with the Immigration inspector, one of the young men was charged with being an ex-convict. He declared that he was a lieutenant in the German army, but when he found that his record was known he admitted that he had served a term of imprisonment for forgery. He said that he had repented of his crime and had come here with his brother to begin a new life, where he would not be hampered by his criminal record. The inspector, however, refused to allow him to land, curtly remarking that there were already too many forgers in the country. He was held until the return of the "New York," when he is to ried to the street. Others rushed out in various degrees of deshabille. One woman on an upper floor ran down the stairs to the sidewalk in a state of great terror, she carried a rubber shoe in each hand, and was clutching them convulsively. After it was found that all danger was over, she hurried back to her flat where she had left a hundred dollar gold watch, a diamond ring, and a pocketbook containing eighty dollars. In her panic she had left them behind and had saved her rubber-shoes. Fright had temporarily deprived her of her usual common-sense, but the same excuse cannot be made for those, who, when this world has passed away, will realize that they saved a fortune, or maintained their position in society, but have lost their souls. (Matt. 16: 26.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Bible is now translated into the languages of nine-tenths of the people of the earth. In the early part of this century it could be read by only one-fifth.

Pere Hyacinthe-Loyson is lecturing every Sunday this month in the Chapelle Taubout, Paris. He occupies more definitely than hitherto an Evangelical attitude. He has now discarded the surplice, and reads a passage from the Scriptures, and then delivers a long, eloquent discourse.

Mr. William Quarrier, whose portrait with a sketch of his wonderful work among the poor we recently published, has had $15,000 guaranteed, which is needed to erect one of two proposed homes for consumptives. Two other friends have given $5,000 which will pay for erecting engines, wash-house, and other offices connected with the consumptive homes.

Miss Lizzie Hausel of Vancouver, has resolved to devote herself to the care of the Chinese lepers of British Columbia, who, isolated on an island in the Gulf of Georgia, have no one to attend them, and have been left alone, with only the occasional visit of a physician to relieve them. Miss Hausel was rescued some time ago, and for two years has been a devoted trained nurse in cases of smallpox and similar dangerous cases.

A peculiar feature of the recent Missionary Sunday occurred at the Eliot Church, Lowell, Mass., where Rev. J. L. Burton of the Turkish Mission found a large number of Armenians in the audience, some of whom were his acquaintances in their homes in Asia. In the course of his address he spoke to them in their own language to their great satisfaction.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey hope to begin a series of Evangelistic services in Washington, D. C., on February 1, at the conclusion of their present campaign in Providence, R. I.

The New York Presbytery has slightly modified its proposed boycott of Union Seminary by recommending, instead of requiring that students applying to be taken under the care of the Presbytery shall not pursue their studies in any seminary disapproved by the General Assembly.

The demand of the people of Uganda for Bibles is so great that Bishop Hirth of the Roman Catholic mission in that land, writes: "After much hesitation I have concluded that it is necessary for us also to print the New Testament, as we cannot prevent the people reading it. We are therefore preparing an edition with explanatory notes."

The Congregationalist's correspondent in Detroit, Mich., writes that Dr. Chapman's work there surpassed anything ever before known in that city and untold good has been done. The last three weeks the evening meetings were all held in the auditorium, in the heart of the business district. It holds 5,000 people and was nightly packed. After meetings were uniformly held and thousands of inquirers' cards were signed.

The laymen who form part of the administrative council of the shrine of "Our Lady of Oropa," near Biella, in Italy, have determined to strip the head of the statue of the Virgin of its ornaments to sell them, and apply the proceeds for the benefit of the shelters for homeless travellers. This will mean a very handsome income in perpetuity, as the jewels have been offered in homage by successive Sovereigns and Princes of the House of Savoy, and are valued at two million dollars. The Bishop and Chapter of Biella, of course, denounce the act as one of impious "spoliation."

apartment house standing on her lot. As she had not authorized its erection, or been told anything about it she was mystified and wondered if she had made a mistake as to the location of her lot. She therefore went to the Department of Assessments to make inquiries. On producing her title she was informed that her tax was now five times as much as before as there was a fifteen thousand dollar house now on the lot. Further inquiries elicited the identity of the owner of the house. It appeared that he had bought a lot adjoining the one owned by the lady but through a mistake of the surveyor, he had built on his neighbor's lot instead of on his own. He learned, to his dismay, that the owner of the land was empowered by law either to collect the rent of his house or to raze it to the ground. Happily for him, he had a person of principle to deal with who did not wish to take advantage of his blunder and he bought from her the land on which the house stood; and so the difficulty was settled to the satisfaction of all parties. He acted wisely in making such an arrangement or he might have lost his house. A similarly prudent course may be recommended to men who are living irreproachable moral lives and are liberal in their gifts to religion and philanthropy, yet who have not given their hearts to Christ. The whole superstructure of morality and beneficence which they have raised will prove worthless to them at the day of final account if it is not based on the fact that Christ holds possession of all hearts. The he taken back to Europe. If he was really penitent and was truly longing for a favorable opportunity to retrieve the past he must have been grievously disappointed. It may be hoped that he has some Christian friend who can tell him of a kingdom whose Ruler glories in receiving all who desire to enter, whatever their past record may have been, and who will not only welcome them, but give them almighty help in their effort to reform. (Luke 15: 7.)

Salvage in a Panic.

An amusing instance of absence of mind in a panic occurred in Brooklyn, N. Y., a few days ago. The janitor of a high-class flat-house went to the basement at night to look after the boilers of the engine that runs the elevator and supplies steam heat through the building. He found that there was too much pressure upon them and that apparently it had been in force for some time. He at once opened the "blow-off valve" to let off some of the steam. The sudden relief caused a strain upon other parts of the boilers and one of the valve plates was blown off with a loud noise. He and his assistant were hurt and severely scalded by the escaping steam. The explosion was felt throughout the building. The roar of the steam added to the fright, and there was a wild rush of the tenants to get out of the building before it was blown down. One woman was alone with her babe and her older child. She snatched up the baby and pushing her little daughter before her hur-

THE CHRISTIAN'S WAY AND WORK AND WATCH.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D. 1. Thess. 1: 9-10, "How ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, who delivered us from his wrath."

THESE words were spoken to an ideal Church; for the Apostle, in commending these Thessalonian Christians, declares their faith and zeal to be so satisfactory that there is no need to say anything. If spoken to an ideal Church, I may say also that these few words set before us the ideal Christian. Let us consider them in this light and see what they teach us.

1. The Christian's Way. "Ye turned to God from idols." When Christ calls himself "the Way," he not only gives us the true access, but the true direction. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was towards God;" it is written in the opening sentence of John's Gospel. At least it is exactly the same phrase, which in our text means "towards God." Adam, by his sin, turned away from God and led the whole race after him. Christ stands ever fronting God, and nothing can turn his face away from the Father. Our repentance turns us about and brings us into the attitude Godward, which his own beloved Son forever maintains.

Here is the crucial test of an evangelical faith, that it insists on conversion, not on correction merely. "Keep straight on," is the cry of moralism. "Turn squarely about," is the demand of evangelicalism. In other words, while natural religion insists that man is headed in the right direction, only needing to be guided, strengthened and quickened to go in the way he is already going, evangelical doctrine declares that man's face is averted from God, and unless he is turned about he will tend further and further away from his Creator. "Prove it from the facts of human experiences," does some one say: Well! let me interrogate your experience. Do you find it most easy and natural to do right and please God, or the contrary? Take out the props from human nature and let it slide, and which way will it go? The restraints of the moral law, the restraints of decent society, the restraints of self-respect; these act like a ratchet upon the human heart to keep it from running down. But if you were placed in circumstances where all these holds and helps were removed, are you not solicitous as to whither you would tend? In other words, which way is the gravitation of your heart? Even the dead cold stone is loyal to the earth to which it belongs, for if I let it go from my hand it instantly seeks the earth. We say that it falls downward. We might more truly say that it rises upward. Since it simply clings to its mother earth and refuses to fall off into space. Gravitation is the loyalty of matter to its true centre. Is divine love the gravitation of your heart, so truly, that if temptation for a moment detaches you from God, you are instantly drawn back to him? Oh, would it were! Of millions who have had a new heart and a divine life put into them, this is true! But of the great multitude it is not true. "The whole world lieth in wickedness," writes John. Souls are not like planets and suns and satellites moving in orderly obedience round God their central Sun, but millions upon millions are as wandering stars plunging into the blackness of darkness.

Hence, on the day when the Gospel began to be preached after Pentecost, Peter cried out, "Repent and be converted," or "Change your mind and turn about," as the words mean exactly. And from that day till this, such has been the message of all faithful preachers. Now this word of Peter gives us the true secret and method of conversion; "Change your mind and turn about." When God would reverse the wheels of our life, he begins with the hub, not with the spokes or rim. The mind or heart is turned in order that the conduct and character may be turned. Reformers and humanitarians are like clock-repairers, who should work on the hands and polish up the face, instead of putting in a new main-spring. I am not disparaging their efforts. God forbid! If even for such the clock of the public conscience could be made to strike right and tell the true time of day, it were worth all the trouble it cost, though it went wrong the next hour. But our real hope after all is in the right heart and that will secure the right hands and face. Change your mind. Turn your will Godward and Christward. That is faith. Right thoughts of God will ensure right conduct towards God and men. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," saith the Scripture.

You will observe that there is a double turning here indicated—a turning from and a turning to—"ye turned to God from idols." These constitute the two sides of genuine conversion—repentance of sin, and faith in Christ; and both should be emphasized equally. Some, like the Romanists and Ascetics, put the whole stress on the first duty, that of repentance of sin. They would make life one long penance, and fill up the days thereof with sorrow and self-condemnation over past transgressions. This is a grievous perversion of the Gospel, for it puts the sinful self into the place which should be occupied by the suffering Christ—for salvation is not in looking at our sins, but in looking at our Saviour.

"The true penitent never forgives himself," says Cardinal Newman, the Romanist. Then he never looks to Christ. That is plain enough, for if he did, he would forgive himself in the forgiveness which the Redeemer has purchased for him on the Cross. Turn upon your sins—look at them with horror and loathing. But be sure that you then turn from them as quickly as possible. "Ye turned to God from idols." The idols have not ceased to be—"covetous which is idolatry"—"the works of the flesh which are idolatry," etc.—these are still found. Turn from these to the living God, I beseech you. Exercise "repentance from dead works," but fail not also to exercise "repentance towards God."

II. The Christian's Work—"to serve the living and true God." "Serving divers lusts and pleasures" was their old occupation, according to the words of the apostle. As radical as is the change of life in conversion, so radical should be the change of employment. Oh! if we could get Christians to serve the Lord with half the zeal with which they serve themselves, what might not be wrought by the Church of God! Our constant pain and sorrow of heart is that so many disciples of the Lord make religion a by-play instead of a business. They provide themselves with the luxuries of worship, in the art and architecture and music of the sanctuary, and imagine that in enjoying these, they are serving the Lord, when really they are only serving themselves. There is such a thing as an inverted worship, in which the praises of God are made to minister chiefly for our pleasure. Thus, Christians who have been turned from one idol, sin, now revert to another idol, self. In this way, by a fatal illusion, their conversion is only a reversion to the old life and the old selfishness.

Now the service here indicated is not the service of liturgy, but the service of labor; and its end is not self, but God. You recall how constantly the apostles name themselves the slaves of Jesus Christ: "Paul, a slave of Jesus Christ." "Simon Peter, a slave and an apostle of Jesus Christ." "James, a slave of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." It is the same word in its verb form in my text.

My brother! Do you take your orders every day from the Lord? "Behold as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters; and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God until he have mercy upon us." So spake David the servant of God, and so should all of us say if we have learned the obedience of sons. You remember the old Hebrew law in regard to voluntary servanthip? If a slave had served his master six years, he was at liberty to go free on the seventh year. But if he should say: I love my master and desire to remain with him, then his master was to bring him unto the judges and to the door-post; and his master should bore his ear through with an awl, and he should become his slave forever. The bored ear was a symbol of perpetual submission to the master's work and will. Hearing is a kind of sovereign among the senses and can lead the whole man into obedience if it be sanctified

Give me control of a man's ear-drum with a surrendered will behind it and I can easily march him forward as a good soldier after the Captain of our salvation. My brother, do you study the secret of getting daily direction from the Lord? Is your first morning prayer each day that of the converted Saul, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" It is one thing for you to make your plan of life and then submit it to the Lord for his approval; it is quite another thing to get your plans from him and then go to work at their execution. In the one case you are the architect of your own life; in the other, you are a workman fulfilling the plan of the great Master-builder of the universe.

Now, if you have really entered into the meaning of your Christian calling, you would rather serve the Lord than to rule a kingdom. I believe it constitutes the sum of all blessedness here below—to wear the livery of Christ in an humble and unworldly spirit; to run on his errands, to serve in his household. Commiserate a Christian because of the menial nature of his work! If that work has the divine uplook, gained through a sincere obedience to Christ, it cannot be menial. A minister was sympathizing with a strong, intelligent Christian woman because of the drudgery of her life when she replied, "Why pity me? I tell you I have taken many a walk through the golden streets of the New Jerusalem while toiling here at my wash-tub." It is a quaint way of putting a most real truth. Communion with Christ transfigures our work and makes drudgery divine. To men of the world this is a great mystery. Refined and gentle women working daily in the slums with all the unutterable filth and repulsiveness found there. "I cannot see how you can do it," says the elegant lady as she lifts up her jeweled hands in astonishment. Men and women leaving the comforts of civilization and plunging into all the misery and darkness of heathendom to spend a life there! "I cannot see how you can do it," says the lover of good society and good surroundings. Of course they cannot understand it. The Gospel creates a new sense when it creates a consecrated heart. It replaces an aesthetic taste by a sympathetic taste—so then, one can find enjoyment in dwelling in scenes of daily sorrow, pleasure in ministering to repulsive sickness, and even see an angel under the sores and scales of the loathsome leper. I declare to you, my hearers, there is no joy on earth to be compared with serving the joyless and hopeless sons of misery in Christ's name and for his glory. And even hereunto are ye called—not to enjoy religion but to serve God. Would that I could call out new workmen this morning from those who have long been Christians, men and women out and out for God, disciples who would henceforth put God at the head of their business and make all their earnings and all their getting absolutely subservient to his glory. It is not more men that we need so much as more men—disciples in whom Christ is concentrated and re-lived. Give me a score of such Christians who fear nothing but God, hate nothing but sin, and are determined to know nothing among men but Christ and him crucified, and I will carry the day for God in any community.

III. The Christian's Watch. "And to wait for his Son from heaven." The right about face in conversion; the outstretched hands in service; the uplifted gaze in watchfulness—these are the three grand characteristics of an Apostolic Christian. The last I dwell upon briefly, reminding you that the New Testament dwells upon it constantly. The return of the Son of Man in glory—this is the hope which in the Gospel gives inspiration for all service, encouragement under all trial and uplift under all depression. How beautifully, in the epistle to the Hebrews, the Apostle rises to this great theme. In their conflicts and trials of faith, he bids them to cast not away their confidence; in their reproach and loss of goods for Christ's sake he tells them that they have need of patience that after they have done the will of God they may receive the promise. Then he reaches the great incentive: "For yet a little while and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." This Pilgrim-Promise—a false theology has transposed into a minor key and bid us remember that in a little while death will come. Thus the uplifted gaze has been changed to the downcast gaze, and the grave has been thrust into the place which belongs to the glory. I recall you this morning to your primitive hope, to your true attitude, "Waiting for his Son from heaven." It is this hope which makes Christians unworldly; that loosens the grip on gold and fastens the grasp on glory. It is this hope which the Gospel has made the key-note to all duty; and the watchword to all aggressive service for Christ. And what right has any one to change the key when the Lord himself has fixed it? What pastor does not know that it is almost easier to get men to turn to God than to prevent their returning to the world? Therefore has God given us the risen and ever-living Christ as the hold and uplift for our hearts. The Christian's look determines his life and the Lord has fastened the believer's eye forever upon himself. "Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith." "Looking for that blessed hope, the glorious offering of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." If this uplook can be kept, fixed and real, and unchangeable, no earthly attraction can draw the Christian away from God. Let none think us visionary and impracticable in urging what God is always urging in his Word—a devout and active and prayerful waiting for the return of our ascended Lord.

"For our citizenship is in heaven," saith the Apostle, from whence we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ. Wonderful confession! "Our citizenship is in heaven." Then pay your taxes where you hold residence and lay up treasures above. Then look for your King to come and fetch you home, and reckon yourselves pilgrims and strangers on the earth. Then count not on death to bring you home but pray evermore as you have been taught: "Even so, come Lord Jesus." And the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen!

THE KAREN BAPTIST MISSION.

AD news of famine is sent by Rev. H. Morrow of the Baptist Mission among the Karens of Siam and Burmah. He writes: I am sorry to say that at present the Karens of both Tavoy and Mergui are suffering from want and food. There are but few families who are not pinched, and scores and hundreds are in great distress. The cause, of course, was a deficient crop last year. We are doing various things to help them. Those on the Tavoy River are getting out timber for a firm here who advances the money on our recommendation. Of course it is tantamount to giving security, but I cannot do otherwise. In prospect of this scarcity we bought a large quantity of food last harvest, and give to them at cost, or at least to needy cases. Rice is abundant, and not very dear, but they have no means to buy. Many of the heathen, particularly, are borrowing from the Burmans at one basket now for five when they reap in November. Of course they must suffer next year again.

We are besieged with requests for help. I have just given a heathen man a bag of rice, a Christian being security for him. To a man and his wife I have given a basket of rice, and they must carry it forty miles into a jungle. To another man I give a basket who has to carry it about the same distance. His wife died a few weeks ago, and he has five small children to keep alive if possible. But I cannot tell you the distressing cases. Die they will, but change their method of farming they will not. I need not tell you that this distress and poverty will hinder all our plans for advance in all respects. A well-to-do Burmese Christian woman, named Mah Hui Aye, gave a few years ago 3,000 rupees ($500) to the Judson chapel in Mandalay, and 500 rupees each to our Burmese and Karen work in Tavoy, the interest only to be used. She now offers to give us 5,000 rupees ($1,500) more to be invested, and the interest used for Burmese work in Tavoy.

THE STARS.

THE stars are heaven's ministers,
Right royally they teach God's glory and omnipotence
In wondrous, holy speech.

O heaven-cradled mysteries,
What sacred paths ye've trod!
Bright, jewelled scintillations
From chariot-wheels of God.

When in the spirit he rode forth
With vast creative aim,
These were his footsteps left behind
To magnify his name.

CHRISTLESS MILLIONS.
South America yet Largely a "Neglected Continent," with few Missionaries.
SOUTH America has been called from a missionary point of view, a "Neglected Continent." When we consider (says a writer in "Church at Home and Abroad") that its total area is nearly 7,000,000 square miles and its estimated population 34,000,000, and that the total number of Protestant missionaries on the continent, including men and women, is 315, and the number of communicants 15,000, it must be apparent that the missionary work in South America has not received the attention it demands.

It is a continent of republics, numbering ten in all, the only exceptions being the provinces of Dutch, French and British Guiana, on the northeast coast. At present seventeen missionary societies have work established in different parts of South America, yet there are large sections practically untouched. Ecuador, with a population of over a million, has no missionary; Bolivia, with a population of 2,300,000, is also without a missionary; Venezuela, with a population of over 2,000,000, has only one Protestant missionary; Peru, with a population of 3,000,000, has only one missionary, with a few native helpers; Colombia, with a population of 4,000,000, has only twelve missionaries; Brazil, with a population of 14,000,000, has only eighty-one missionaries. In no country where Protestant missions have been established is there such a dearth of missionary effort as in South America, in proportion to the population.

There are at least 30,000,000 people on the South American continent practically untouched by missionary effort. Romanism is at its worst in the country of South America. Its blight all over those fair regions has been terrible. Its rule has kept the people in the bonds of superstition and in the darkness of ignorance. The North American continent has an object lesson before it in the South, of what its destiny would have been had its lot been cast under Romanism, rather than the evangelical form of Christianity. The development in the North has been along the lines of freedom, intelligence, and morality, under the enlightened training of a spiritual and Biblical form of Christianity. The result in the South has been marred and shadowed by priestly tyranny, gross ignorance, and defective morality, combined with superstitious bigotry and the lowest forms of external and hollow ceremonialism. The spirit of the Inquisition still hides in the Papal system of South America. The blind intolerance of mediæval Romanism still fights for supremacy, and the battle of the age for liberty of conscience is yet to be fought and won in a large portion of the southern continent.

CHRISTIAN WORK ON LEBANON.
On a spur of Lebanon, about 2,500 feet above the sea, overshadowed by a grove of fragrant pine trees, is the hospital of the Society of Friends. The physician in charge of this institution, Dr. Besharah Manasseh, a native of Syria, is a graduate of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, a skilful physician. He is assisted by a devoted corps of English nurses. In this well-appointed hospital, thousands of Druses, Sunnite Moslems, Mutawalles, Greeks, Maronites, and Protestants are treated annually, either gratuitously or for a nominal charge. The dispenser, who compounds the medicines, is also a native of Syria, and was a pupil in the Syrian Protestant College. This medical charity has done much to soften prejudice and win the hearts of the people of this part of Lebanon, and add to the influence of the industrial school for boys and the school for girls, which have for several years been conducted by the same society.

THEY DELIGHT EVERYBODY.
Still more Letters from Subscribers who have Received "The Christian Herald" Premiums.
BLACKSTONE, MASS.: From Manger to Throne is just the book for long evenings at home. May God bless it to each who reads it!
MRS. J. M. BACON.
Tiffin, O.: From Manger to Throne is a grand book to have in the home and should be in the hands of all. It is a mine of rich blessing, for which I express many thanks. T. H. SONNEDECKER.
NEW YORK: To say that I am much pleased with the beautiful premium Bible is but a faint expression of praise. The great wonder to me is, how can you give so much for so little money.
MRS. HENRY E. CROCKER.
NORTH STAMFORD, CONN.: From Manger to Throne is just what I have longed to possess. I am very fond of Dr. Talmage's style of writing, as he has a beautiful, unique way of saying things.
MRS. M. A. SCOTFIELD.
FARMER CITY, ILL.: From Manger to Throne received. It far surpassed my expectations. As to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I consider it one of the best religious papers printed. As a Methodist, I get more genuine inspiration from it than any other paper.
J. J. HAAS.
BABYLON, L. I.: My daughter-in-law, Mrs. H. Noble, has just received the Teachers' Bible, and it exceeds our expectations, it is such a beautiful book, and so complete in every way. I do not know how to express my gratitude for such a treasure.
L. C. NOBLE.
LOWELL, MASS.: From Manger to Throne is the best premium I have ever been privileged to receive. Permit me to express my admiration for the grand work you are doing in giving such a magnificent paper as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the public. I have read its pages with an absorbing interest, and have been enthused many times to more aggressive action after reading about the glorious self-sacrificing work it chronicles.
CHAS. J. KEVIL.
MADISON, Wis.: I gladly acknowledge the receipt of your marvellous premium—the Emerald red under gold Teachers' Bible. Of nine Bibles in our house this is the handsomest of all, and we have those that cost from five to nine dollars.
GEORGE R. COOK.
THOMPSONVILLE, CONN.: From Manger to Throne came to hand. Please accept my sincere thanks for the beautiful present. I anticipate many delightful hours, reading the final description of what Dr. Talmage, and you, also, saw, in the Holy Land. It is a truly fascinating book. My friends who have seen it express their admiration.
MRS. A. A. BREWSTER.
JERSEY CITY HEIGHTS, N. J.: I am more than delighted with both paper and premium. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a book or paper which I have longed for, to read of what is going on in New York among the poor people. But for this paper we might never hear of them. I read it to my children who take as much pleasure as myself in it.
EMMA L. GRUNDY.
WARREN, ME.: From Manger to Throne came duly to hand, and am much pleased with the book. Gospel truth thus set forth in that graphic style which is peculiar to Dr. Talmage must of necessity awaken new and practical familiarity with the inspired Word. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was a luxury when we first began to receive it, but is now considered a necessity.
W. O. BICKFORD.
FAIRBURY, NEB.: The package containing the Teachers' Bible and the beautiful book From Manger to Throne was received in good order last week; also the souvenir of Olive Wood which I prized most of all. Words cannot express my appreciation for these beautiful gifts and I can only write the simple language of "Thank you," but which means so much in my case.

THE COMING REGENERATION.
The Restoration of Israel the Beginning of Universal Blessedness.
BY REV. W. WILLIAMS.
WE have seen that a great blessing, even the quickening of the mass of the Gentile world from their present death of trespasses and sins, is assured to them in the gracious purpose of Almighty God. But this blessing is restrained till Israel is again received. Then, but not till then, when, as Isaiah saith (11: 2-5) Jerusalem's warfare shall be accomplished, and her iniquity pardoned, shall "the glory of the Lord be revealed, and all flesh see it together." Then, but not till then, when, as the Lord saith by the Prophet Joel (2: 27, 28), "Ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel, and that I am the Lord your God, and none else," will be fully showered forth the promise which gave only its first droppings on the day of Pentecost, "I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh."
But what then does Zion's restoration wait for? Even for the coming and presence of her Lord. So, therefore, we find it written in Psalm 122, that when the time to favor her, yea, the set time is come, when the Lord shall build up Zion, and contemporaneously as is there asserted appear in his glory, then shall also "the heathen fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth thy glory."
What a prospect of peace and happiness for this troubled world is here opened to our view! We may well pray for the peace of Jerusalem, seeing what blessed results are to follow upon it for all the kingdoms of the world. We may well if for this cause only, join in the prayer of the apostle, "Even so, come Lord Jesus" seeing how bright a day will then pour its light upon all the families of the earth.
But here it will be necessary to put before you two or three independent proofs (independent, I mean, of the assumption that Israel's receiving is only effected at the advent of the Lord) of the fact, that this bright day which awaits mankind assuredly cannot be till the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing on his wings.
First, we see from the text that a time is to come in which there shall be "life from the dead" to the Gentile world when therefore, the world at large shall be in the possession of true religion, and the mystery of godliness prevail: God manifest in the flesh being the one object of the adoration and love of all mankind, and inducing a holy obedience in the general rule of character and conduct among all.
But how can this be, as long as the mystery of iniquity is at work, and the man of sin "opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped;" "whose coming is after the working of Satan with all his power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish?" While these things are in the world, where is opportunity for that universal love of truth, and its effectual power upon the hearts and lives of men at large, of which we find mention made here? It is manifest that there can be none. The regeneration of the nations must therefore wait for him, "by the brightness of whose coming" that Wicked is to be destroyed. I give no opinion here as to who or what that Wicked is, but merely direct your attention to the fact, that the whole interval from the apostles' days to the bright and glorious coming of the Lord is all occupied, either by the man of sin or the mystery of iniquity which is of him, and worketh toward him; where then shall we look for "life from the dead" in the world till that coming take place?
Secondly, in Zechariah 14: 9, we find mention made of that universal godliness which the apostle's prediction now before us implies: "The Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one." But what event, then, does the 5th verse lead us to look for, as ushering in the glorious time? "The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee."
Thirdly, what is that "regeneration" which, according to St. Matthew 19: 28, shall take place, "when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory?"—when therefore, he shall have come again? Seeing that we expect the conversion of all Israel, and the communication of "life from the dead" to the nations at large, can we suppose that this term has no reference to these great events? No, it is impossible.

THE TEMPTATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Jan. 11. Matt. 4: 1-11.

IT must have cost Jesus a painful effort to describe this scene of his temptation to his disciples. That he did so, with his own lips, is evident, for no man witnessed it and we should not know that it ever occurred had he not spoken. His motive for giving the history of it and causing it to be placed on record, is obvious. He wished his own experience to be helpful to his people through all generations. And it has been so. The tempted believer who is inclined to think that he must be very vile or the tempter would not approach him, is comforted by the thought that his pure and holy Master was similarly assailed. He has in the narrative also the assurance that the enemy is not invincible, for here he reads the story of his defeat.

The scene is inexpressibly sad and pathetic. The young man, probably only just become conscious of his divinity and of the mission entrusted to him, having passed through that wonderful scene at his baptism, when he was recognized by the heavenly voice and proclaimed the Son of God, goes out into the desert to meditate. A great work lies before him; such responsibility as his was never before or since, laid on human shoulders. Had he the power to bear it? Was he in very deed the incarnation of Deity? He must be alone and think. He wanders away, that he may examine himself and realize his powers and the nature of his work. Heedless of the demands of his physical nature in his mental absorption he eats nothing and becomes physically weak. What does it signify to one who can work miracles? If that voice from heaven was true, as his consciousness tells him, he can turn the very stones to bread. Thus by one act he can relieve his hunger and test his miraculous power. But he perceives that divine power was not given him for his own personal advantage. God can support him, for "man does not live by bread alone." The temptation is grappled with and overcome. He will trust in God. The believer who sees no prospect of support, whose income is precarious, who may be eating his last loaf, may think of this scene and take courage. He is in the hands of God and there is no need for him to do wrong, to compromise with his conscience, or to be false to his faith. "Man does not live by bread alone." Like his Master he may put the temptation aside. Luke, who is a more careful recorder than Matthew, reverses the order of the next temptation and his account is more natural. Christ's thoughts turn from his physical needs to his work. It is enormous, stupendous. Some way occurs to him by which it may be accomplished, but that way looks like homage to Satan. It is a concession to the devil, a recognition of the usurper's claims to empire. As he sees it in this light, he thrusts the thought away. He will serve God only, and if he could gain the whole world by subservience to Satan, he will not do it. How many of God's servants have drawn courage from that conflict! The pastor approached by some worldly-minded Christian, urged to cease denouncing some sin, or to honor some wicked, but influential, man that the church treasury may benefit and money may come for the Lord's work, thinks of his Master's conflict and overcomes the temptation. Then, weary and physically weak, the sorely tried, but victorious, Saviour, is assailed again. He is tempted to commit suicide. It will not really be suicide, because it that voice was true, if he is really the Son of God, angels will have charge of him and he will not be hurt, though he fling himself from the top of that lofty spire, and if he is mistaken and he is only man, he is so miserable that it is better he should die. This will be a test. But is it right to apply a test? Should he not rather trust God without a test? There is a command,

"Thou shalt not tempt [or try] the Lord thy God." So he vanquishes that temptation also. In every case the victory comes to him through his faith. He will trust his Father as to his bodily wants, his work and his life. His confidence in him is triumphant; and so may his followers triumph. They have no need to put themselves in a critical situation that they may see if God will interfere in their behalf. They must beware of presumption. Without testing their sonship, they must be confident if the path of duty leads them to a crisis, God will deliver them and they must not seek the furnace of trial. Thus like their Master, strong in faith may they bear the assaults of temptation and like him come forth more than conquerors.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

The annual State Convention at Jacksonville, Ill., was an enthusiastic gathering. It occupied three days and the interest continued increasing to the last meeting. Among the speakers were Rev. J. W. Van Cleave, Rev. J. A. Burchett, Rev. Joseph F. Berry, Rev. J. H. Odgers of Chicago, who preached to the Convention at the Sunday morning service and Rev. Jesse Bowman Young, who preached the Convention sermon on Sunday evening. Model Devotional meetings, Department Conferences and the Question Box kept the delegates busy in the intervals between the public meetings. The following are the State officers for the year: president, C. E. Piper, Chicago; first vice-president, Rev. F. H. Cumming; second vice-president, Mr. R. W. Ropiequet, Belleville; third vice-president, Rev. T. M. Dillon, Jacksonville; fourth vice-president, Hattie Gonsoles, Rockford; treasurer, T. C. Northrup, Englewood. The retiring president, M. V. Holt, was elected field secretary. A grand rally was held recently in Bromfield Church, Boston, Mass., to meet the General Secretary, Dr. Edwin A. Schell, who paid a formal and official visit to the city. Twenty-five ministers were present to welcome the secretary, so that there was no lack of speakers. An afternoon and evening session were held and the Chapters were present in force with their banners. An interesting feature of the meetings was the description of the Epworth Settlement in Boston, by Rev. R. H. Walker of the League House. Dr. Schell himself took charge of the Question Box and answered effectively some rather difficult and delicate questions. Among his more important utterances was one that "it is better to run the risk of narrowness, rather than to lose the power gained by concentration." Dr. J. O. Knowles presided at the love-feast in the evening. A call has been issued to the Leagues of Kentucky for a convention to form a State Union. It is to be held at the Fourth Avenue Church, Louisville, on Feb. 8.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF BOSTON, MASS.

THE Y. M. A. A. OF BOSTON, MASS.

On this page we give a picture of the building occupied by one of the oldest and largest Young Men's Christian Associations in the United States. It was organized in 1851 and has over four thousand members. It will thus be forty-three years old when its representatives go to England this year to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the original Association. It is not always that age is associated with energy and activity, but in the case of the Boston Y. M. C. A., years have not robbed the venerable institution of its vigor but seem to have only made it more efficient for its work by the ripe fruits of experience. The monthly magazine issued by the Association contains a record of labor and enterprise and effort such as would surprise many and shows how sagacious as well as how sympathetic with the young men of the city, its managers are. Its educational classes are instructed in penmanship, shorthand, book-keeping, banking, music and singing, electricity, drawing, French, German and other acquirements which help the young men to qualify themselves for the higher grades of their professions. In addition to these, professional instructors are at the gymnasium and swimming baths to help the young men to the attainment of the physical development which has so much influence on the moral and spiritual well-being. The Association's property is worth $320,000 and is a well arranged and commodious edifice.

THE Y. W. C. A. IN CANADA.

An impetus has been given to the extension in Canada of Christian work among young women, by the interest evinced in it by Lady Aberdeen, the wife of the new Governor-General. She attended a recent meeting in Montreal of Young Women's Christian Associations and explained the organization of a National Council of Women effected in Toronto, and proposed that a similar one be formed in Montreal. Lady Aberdeen has been appointed President for Canada; in each province the wife of the Lieutenant-Governor will act as honorary Vice-President, and the Council will also be provided with another such officer. Mrs. McDougall of the Y. W. C. A., was appointed Vice-President for Montreal. The Council is to be a thoroughly representative body, arranged on "a basis so broad that everybody can come in." Mrs. McDougall then, in a few earnest words, spoke of the need of unity amongst workers, and expressed her belief that Her Excellency had been sent to Canada to promote that unity. Lady Aberdeen took occasion to repudiate a remark attributed to her by a newspaper to the effect that she had compared Canadian and English ladies to the disadvantage of the former. She said that she had not made the remark and had never had such an opinion as she had been represented as expressing. It is expected that the readiness of Lady Aberdeen to attend meetings and aid in organizing Associations in Canada will lead to an increase of activity in this sphere.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

At the recent State Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies of Indiana, it was reported that there are now 1,145 Societies, a gain of 325 since last year. Of this number, 261 are Junior Societies, a gain of 161.

The Young Women's Christian Association is taking deep root in Denmark. There are now 140 Associations, the oldest being one organized in 1880. The Copenhagen branch has over four hundred members.

The Melbourne Young Women's Christian Association has had a number of good missionary meetings lately, addressed by Mr. Cheok Hong Cheong, and others, amongst them, Miss A. Brown, who is going out to China in connection with the Church Missionary Society.

The first annual convention of the Epworth Leagues of the Springfield district St. Louis Conference, was held at Billings, December 5, 6. Delegates from nearly all of the Leagues in the district were in attendance, and the convention was a pronounced success.

Interesting addresses to the young men of Ireland are being given at the Dublin Y. M. C. A., by Mr. W. Fry, Jr., who lately returned from a trip to the United States and Canada. He describes the work carried on by Mr. Moody, and his Irish Brigade of twenty-five young Irishmen lately sent out from Dublin.

The number of branches of the Young Men's Christian Association in Denmark is 132, of which there are seven in Copenhagen. The principal branch was founded in 1878. It is reported that two branches have less than ten members each. The faith and courage of these few to keep together is under trial, but large results have often small beginnings.

An English Christian Endeavor Society has arranged that each member invite two of the poorest inhabitants of the town to a tea and entertainment on December 28. By this means about 120 poor people were enabled to enjoy a pleasant evening. Might not some other societies adopt this plan, and thus brighten the lives of a few of their poor older brethren?

The Anglo-American Y. M. C. A., Paris, celebrated its silver anniversary last week in one of the McAll Mission Halls. The gathering was the best for many years. Rev. H. E. Noyes, D.D., who took the chair, spoke highly of the work the Association was doing, as did the other speakers. An appeal was made to the Association to remove to larger and more conspicuous premises.

The local union of the Christian Endeavor Society in New York has instructed its Executive Committee to reorganize—that is, to make changes in the constitution and by-laws that will enable the Christian Endeavorers in the city to do better, more united and more aggressive work. Seven districts have been formed in the city and the towns immediately north of it. Each district will have fifteen or twenty societies. The Christian Endeavor societies and Epworth Leagues of the East Side held a rally at the East Baptist Church, in Madison St., on Dec. 14.

Mr. Addison Moore, President of the St. Louis, Mo., B. Y. P. U., reports an effort on the part of his Union which, if it is extensively followed in other cities, will gladden the hearts of the chiefs of the missionary departments. He says, "The city Mission Board is feeling the hard times. Money is scarce this year, yet it must be had in even larger amounts than usual; so our B. Y. P. U. has determined to lend a helping hand by giving a series of first-class entertainments during the season. The prospect is that we shall net six or seven hundred dollars before we finish the series."

The Children's Jubilee.

A Season of Joy and Merriment Among the Little Ones Everywhere.

THERE is no joy in life so pure as the joy of a child, no smile so winning, no laugh so free from even a cloudlet of care. Poets have sung of the laughter of children, painters and sculptors have immortalized with brush and chisel the pretty, innocent playfulness that only healthy boyhood and girlhood can know. These holiday weeks have made of the whole civilized world a children's playground. Even grown men and women have not disdained to share in the gambols around the Christmas tree, in the jollity brought by the visits of old Santa Claus, and in the delight that has come to the little folks with the possession of toy-treasures, long wished for, but only now realized. But there are in every great city thousands of children to whom Christmas means, alas! only a continuance of the dull and joyless poverty and hardship of the rest of the year.

Still, the child-nature is buoyant and possesses unlimited resources of innocent pleasure within itself. Even without the aid of pretty gifts and costly toys, these little men and women can extract lots of amusement out of each others' society. Who does not remember, with a faint thrill of pleasure, the games of childhood—those sports that made the eyes sparkle and caused us uncontrollable laughter! Our artist in the picture on this page, has given us a scene with which most children are familiar. A group of young Italian playmates, in a very humble dwelling, indeed, are having a rollicking time at "blindman's buff." The little fellow whose eyes are bandaged will imagine, when he grasps the mop, that he has caught one of his mates, and the others who know what is in store for him, are laughing in great glee at the prospect of his surprise.

Children will have amusements, whether their parents choose their amusements for him, or leave the children to choose them for themselves. The amusements will tend to the gain or to the loss of the children. It is for parents to decide whether the children shall be left to choose their own amusements, with the probability of their choosing to their own harm; or whether the parents shall choose helpful amusements for their children, and shall make these amusements more attractive than the harmful ones. The result of this choice is an important one to the parents, and a yet more important one to the children. No innocent amusement need be discouraged, but it is well for the parent to keep in touch with the little ones even in the seemingly trivial matter of play, in order to guard against a choice of recreation that might be injurious either to the body or the soul, or both.

Woman's Business Capacity.

In a recent address, Miss Willard gave some interesting views on woman's capacity as a presiding officer. "Some controversy has arisen," she said, "as to whether a woman who presides over a business meeting should be called 'Madam Chairman,' and our English friends have been at a loss as to the correct manner of addressing their president when she is in the chair; but I know it is Lady Henry Somerset's wish to be addressed as 'Madam President' when in the annual meeting, and 'Madam Chairman' when in the Executive Committee. Some persons have objected to the word 'Madam' and said that 'Mrs.' was preferable; but 'Mrs.' is only a contraction of 'Mistress,' which is surely no more appropriate than the word 'Madam,' the latter having become thoroughly anglicised and set forth in the dictionary, not a foreign word, but one incorporated into our vernacular. "Madam Chairman" has an odd sound, to which I think it will take English ladies a long time to get accustomed. Why not 'Madam President' all the time?

Woman and Christianity.

A very curious indication of the effect of Christianity upon woman was brought to light by the late Prof. Rolleston. He made, in the Museum of Oxford, one of the largest and most remarkable collections of human skulls that has ever been brought together. A friend informed the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes that when the professor instituted minute investigations with respect to the capacity of skulls before the advent of Christ and since, he discovered the striking fact that the difference in size between the seal leaping from the water as if followed by some enemy. It came near the boat, swimming around it several times, and then, making a leap, the men saw that it was being chased by a large fish. One of the fishermen dropped his line, and, stepping into the bow, leaned over and held out his hands.

To the man's amazement, the seal immediately dashed toward him, and, with his help, scrambled out of the water into the boat, just in time to escape the sharp weapon of a swordfish that darted by. The men were so pleased with its action in coming to them that they kept it as a pet, and the seal became a familiar object about the shore. The fishermen had a small house upon the beach, and here the seal made its home. When the men came down to shore, the seal was there to greet them, frisking about and attempting to crawl into the boat. When not taken in, it would follow the boat out, swimming alongside, with its intelligent black eyes fixed upon them. During the winter the seal was moved up to the home of one of the fishermen, where it spent much of its time by the kitchen fire, showing what seemed to be actual appreciation of the kindness of those who had saved it from death several months before.

A Floral Parable.

This pretty parable is from the pen of a reverend writer: "The flowers got into a debate as to which of them was the flower of God: and the rose said, 'I am the flower of God, for I am the fairest and most perfect in beauty and variety of form and delicacy of fragrance of all the flowers.' And the crocus said, 'No, you are not the flower of God. Why, I was blooming long before you bloomed. I am the primitive flower: I am the first one.' And the lily-of-the-valley said, modestly, 'I am small, but I am white; perhaps I am the flower of God.' And the trailing arbutus said, 'Before any of you came forth, I was blooming under the leaves

"HOME OF PEACE."

A LITTLE haven, calm and sweet,
For weary ones a blest retreat,
To "rest awhile" at Jesus' feet.

A nest for birds of broken wing,
A "door of hope" where each may sing,
As in the days of youth and spring.

A type of promised rest above,
An atmosphere of holy love,
Where dwells that sacred, heavenly Dove.

O may this Home be ever such Where many may his garment touch:
A gift for him who gave so much.

And when this earthly scene is past,
Sure anchor may each inmate cast,
In Jesus' Home of Peace, at last.

BEAUTY AND GOODNESS.

A bright woman, when applauded recently for her goodness, begged her friend to let the matter drop. "For," she said, whimsically, "though I do try to be good from some really high motives, yet I have one reason for trying which I am afraid is a low one." "What do you mean?" inquired her laughing friend. "I mean that I once heard, many years ago, that beauty after fifty depended not on features, but on character. Like all women, I desired to be beautiful, and as Providence had denied me the 'features' necessary to secure that result in early life I determined to make the attempt to be beautiful at fifty. I am thirty-five now," she concluded, cheerfully, "and I must confess that I see no signs of the Indian-summer loveliness, but I still try to be good." These friends treated the matter as a jest, but there is really sense and truth in the saying that beauty in later life, in either man or woman, is dependent upon character far more than upon form or color. Nobility will tell upon the outward aspect. The carriage of the figure, the poise of the head, the expression of the face—these come to reveal more and more, with the lapse of time, the inner life. Unselfishness, sincerity, thoughtfulness, refinement—lend their charm to those who have consistently cherished them, until in old age they may really become beautiful.

In the new and entertaining book "Samantha at the World's Fair," the following amusing incident is related:

There wuz some little pictures there about six inches square, and marked: "Little Pictures for a Child's Album."

And Josiah sez to me, "I believe I'll buy one of 'em for Babe's album that I got her last Christmas."

"Sez he, 'I've got ten cents in change, but probable,' sez he, 'it won't be over eight cents.'"

"Sez I, 'Don't be too sanguine, Josiah Allen.'"

"Sez he, 'I'm sanguinary with good horse sense to back it up. They throwed in a chromo three feet square with the last calico dress you bought at Jonesville, and this hain't over five or six inches big.'"

"Wall" sez I, "buy it if you want to."

"Wall," sez he, "that's what I lay out to do, mem."

So he accosted a Columbus Guard that stood nigh, and sez he, "I'm a-goin' to buy that little picter, and I want to know if I can take it home now in my vest pocket?"

"That picter," sez he, "is twenty thousand dollars. It is owned by the German National Gallery, and is loaned by them," and sez he, with a ready flow of knowledge inherent to them Guards, "the artist, Adolph Menzel, is to German art what Meissonier is to the French. His pictures are all bought by the National Gallery, and bring enormous sums."

Josiah almost swooned away. Nothin' but pride kep' him up—

I didn't say nothin' to add to his mortification. Only I simply said—

"Babe will prize that picter, Josiah Allen." And he sez, "Be a fool if you want to; I'm a-goin' to git sunthin' to eat." And he hurried me along at almost a dog-trot.

ITALIAN CHILDREN AT PLAY. A HOLIDAY GAME AT HOME.

male skull and the female skull is much less in the Christian era than in any previous period of history.

"Here then, as we see," writes Mr. Hughes, "we have imbedded in the very physical frame of woman a very striking indication of the way in which Christianity has already enlarged her intellectual sphere; and this is but a prophecy of the immense and limitless services which Christianity will render to woman in the earlier ages before us."

A Pet From the Ocean.

Even the denizens of the sea sometimes show remarkable intelligence and affection. A few years ago, some fishermen were off the Maine coast, when they observed a commotion on the surface, and soon made out a and under the snow. Am I not the flower of God? But all the flowers cried out, 'No, you are no flower at all; you are a come outer.' And then God's wind, blowing on the garden, brought this message to them: 'Little flowers, do you not know that every flower that answers God's sweet spring call, and comes out of the cold, dark earth, and lifts its head above the sod, blooming forth, catching the sunlight from God and flinging it back to men, taking the sweet south wind from God and giving it back to others in sweet and blessed fragrance—do you not know that they are all God's flowers?' All they that take spiritual life from God and, answering it, come forth from worldliness and darkness and selfishness to give out light and fragrance and love, they are God's flowers."

HAD Alice Paull failed in her duty to her husband in ceasing to remonstrate with him upon the duty he owed to God and the Church he had ordained? Yet, would it have made any difference in his behavior had she worried him with argument and entreaty?

She supposed nothing made any difference in anything now. She was a deserted wife. The name transmitted to her by a godly ancestry who had kept it clean was likely at any hour to be breathed upon by public scandal; would perhaps, to-morrow, be dragged through the filth of newspaper notoriety. Perhaps her picture and Ernest's would figure in black outlines all out of drawing—just below the heading in fierce capitals, "Embezzlement and elopement."

Dear Father of pity! how wretched she was, torn and bleeding and dying of thirst, soul and body.

"Who passing through the valley of Baca, make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools."

That tired-looking preacher must have quoted the text. It could not have come to her of itself. It had no relevancy to her case, except that parching thirst actually suggested water.

As pants the hart for cooling streams,
When heated by the chase.

Ernest and she used to sing that together. He had a glorious voice. In the lower register the tones were like a bass drum; the higher were pure and mellow.

Why did she say "had" and "were," as if he were dead? He was never more alive than at this very moment. "They would be well out to sea by now. She wondered, dully, between the spasms of pain who "Mrs. Paul Morgan" was, and why she had never suspected her existence until Roger reluctantly told her that her husband had taken another wife with him. There had never been anything like this before in the Lanier family. They would take it hard—her sisters and her sister-in-law. Maybe, they would blame her. The wife is always blamed in such affairs.

Was she talking of herself? This woman sitting among respectable Christians, and thinking such things while they listened to the words of the man of God? She—she—Alice Paull—was a repudiated wife—disgraced forever! Between her and the sharpest blast of the world's scorn was not even the thin veil of a decent pretence of social caste. Her husband—the lover of her youth (and how she had loved and believed in him!) the father of her children—had turned loose all the furies of the bottomless pit upon her, and from afar, jeered at her misery.

"All thy waves and thy billows have gone over me!"

"All, Lord! not one is spared me. Out of the depths—ah! Thou who rememberest our frame, knowest out of what depths—I cry unto thee! Look upon my affliction and my pain! my affliction and my pain! my pain!"

She had not known where she was for a while in the temporary stupor, that yet did not release her from the sense of suffering. Her head lay against the hard wall; the heavy lids drooped until the eyes were almost hidden, while the neat little prayers, well put together and singularly correct in phraseology and grammatical construction for a plain, middle-class congregation, were addressed to the throne of grace. For aught they asserted or implied, every brother—and, judging by association—every sister—there had had precisely the same temptations and the same deliverances from temptations, the same sorrows—and joys as like to one another as impressions stamped by one and the same die.

As the rustle of consciousness that the duty of the evening was done, ran through the audience with the rising of the pastor to announce the last hymn, Alice Paull sat up—right, a movement that concealed from her the face of the woman at the melodeon. A nameless quality in the touch upon the keys sent a faint thrill to the clammy hands and feet; as the flexible soprano, tenderly devout, took up the words of the sacred song, the heart of the stranger within the sacred gates was moved to longing that had in it some element of hope; a wave of passionate desire, bursting bounds in the strain that electrified the hearers.

A wave, the undertow of which swept her out again into the outer night.

She was never able to recall, and Elspeth could only guess by her drenched clothing and hair, and the mire clogging her boots, how long, or how far she walked after the service was over. She may have wandered around and around in a circle, a dim sense that she ought, by and by, to go home to her children keeping her in the neighborhood of Mendebra's avenue, if hers was the figure that passed her old schoolfellow's window at ten o'clock. It was about eleven when the old servant keeping watch at the darkened parlor-window, saw her mistress come laggingly up the steps, and hastened to open the door for her.

"Ah, Elspeth! You should not have sat up for me. Are the children all right?"

She brought out the words with an effort, taking short breaths between them. While speaking, she gained the stair-foot and began to go up, without waiting for an answer. As she climbed, she caught at the balustrade and lifted her feet with evident difficulty.

"It's yesel', ma'am, I should be speiring after, I'm thinking."

Elspeth said it behind her teeth, and followed her mistress to her room at a discreet distance. She brought forward an easy-chair, and as Mrs. Paull mechanically sank into it, began to undress her as she might Gladys, if the child had been caught in a shower—swiftly and silently.

Mrs. Paull submitted without demur. When her bonnet was removed, she let her head drop against the cushioned back of the chair, her hands were limp, and cold as clay. Not a sound was heard in the room but the dull "frou-frou" of the soaked garments as the servant drew them off and shook out the moisture, and her stepping to and fro. When a wadded wrapper was put on over the night-dress, Elspeth folded a thick shawl about the lady's knees, and, sitting down upon the floor, took the cold feet in her lap and chafed them fast and hard.

The languid lids were partially lifted, one lax hand moved toward the Scotchwoman's shoulder, but fell back without reaching it. "Faithful among the faithless found!" said a hoarse whisper.

She dozed off again, not awaking while Elspeth wrapped her feet in warm flannel, laid them upon a cushion, and went to the bath-room for hot water with which to fill a rubber bag to put between the sheets. The sealed lids did not flicker even when she was lifted in a pair of strong arms and deposited in the bed.

"Miss Alice! my dear mistress! wull ye please tak' a sup o' this?"

It was more the unwonted sob in the voice that spoke than the call itself that reached the lethargic brain. Elspeth had slipped one arm under the heavy head, and held a steaming cup in the other hand. A strange smile drew the lips apart; the patient bent them to the draught, and swallowed it eagerly, as if consumed by inward fever. As the servant returned to the bed after setting away the empty cup, she met the full gaze of eyes that had in them mysterious meaning.

"Elspeth! I heard my mother call me three times to-night. I think—I hope that I am going to her!"

"It wad be nobbut ye lancy, ma'am. Ye are oftentimes light o' head wi' th' headache."

"No! my head is a little confused now, but it was clear then—quite clear. I was walking fast, and certainly not thinking of her. There was nobody in sight in the street, for it was raining. I heard her as distinctly as I hear my own voice at this instant. She called, 'Alice! Alice! Alice!' tenderly; oh, so sweetly and lovingly! I am glad that she wants me!"

CHAPTER IV.

"There is a plan working in our lives; and if we keep our hearts quiet and our eyes open, it all works together; and if we don't, it all fights together, and goes on fighting till it comes right, somehow, somewhere.—Annie Keary."

On the southwest corner of Mendebra's avenue and Post street stands a yellow frame house, two honest stories in height, and with a twenty-five feet front. The effect of comparative height and breadth is to make the old-fashioned dwelling appear "squat" among the tall, lean apartment-flats near to it on the same side of the way, and upon the opposite corner. If you survey the premises from Post street, you will see that the house is three rooms deep, and being on a corner, that all the rooms must be light.

There are two bells beside the front door, the "Dutch" stoop of which is raised but two steps from the street. Above the upper bell was once nailed an oblong strip of tin, painted white, lettered in blue: "MARY WILLIAMS, NURSE, &c."

The "&c.," was her own unassisted device, and I believe the idea to be original. Those who had the best reasons in the world for knowing what they were talking of, used to say that, admirable as she was as nurse, the "&c." was the best part of her. We will leave our story to define what entered into it and glorified the cabalistic characters.

"&c." may have something to do with some or all of the half-dozen invitations which "Nurse Williams," as people in whose houses she worked professionally preferred to call her—using the title generally as a pet-name—had received to eat her Thanksgiving dinner at that number of tables. She had declined them all—gratefully, with the large, slow smile that belonged to the "&c." side of her, and in the round, gentle voice that could not have gone with any other smile. It was not only that the voice was round, but it was cushiony as well, never chopping or harsh, and with never an edge to one of the agreeable inflections.

Nurse Williams had had a busy season thus far, what with whooping-cough, malaria-dreps left over from the summer, and what figured in her note-book as "pneumonia," in her everyday speech as "new money" (o long). Patients and their families said she had been wonderfully successful, even for her, with all her cases this fall—"a sickly time," by the way. She had told her pastor, Rev. Dr. Barnes, of the "Jeremy Taylor," last Friday night, when he expressed his pleasure at seeing her again at prayer-meeting, that she "felt to praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men."

"By the time folks get to your age and mine, doctor," she had added, "that is an old story, but it is one we are never tired of telling."

In her secret thoughts she had meditated—"if the Lord did not object—to have a real rest-day treat" at home on that Thursday, and to spend it after her own fashion. Accordingly, she had betaken herself to the butcher's, the baker's and the green grocer's on Wednesday and laid in sundry stores suitable to the occasion to be honored in the observance of sixty million of happy people on the morrow.

Among her acquisitions were a fat turkey—"a little dear!" she had pronounced it, to the smiling butcher's gratification—only a six-pounder, but it would surfeit one lone woman for a week if she had not known where to send what would be left over by Friday morning; a pumpkin pie, with a rim of flakey crust like the setting of a big "gold-stone" brooch; cranberries to be made into jelly that night, and to be turned out, a tremulous, scarlet, semi-transparent mound, next day; a can of French green peas; two oranges; two pippins; a bunch of black Hamburg grapes; a pound of fresh butter sent from a New Jersey creamery by a former patient; a loaf of cake from another; and from one of the "new money" convalescents, a box of superb chrysanthemums—Japanese, with sweeping fringes of shaded yellow, cream-white and royal purple. Generous moisture suffused the pleasant gray eyes as she made ready her banquet at one o'clock, and sat her down to the discussion of the same. There had been a praise-service in the chapel of the Jeremy Taylor at half-past nine, and she attended it in preference to the union service in a grander and more fashionable church; where the music was sure to be magnificent, and municipal reform and political corruption would be the burden of the thank-offering to the Lord of the harvest and Author of peace and concord. She was at home and out of her Sunday clothes by eleven o'clock, and was glad and yet more glad of her own nest with quietness within, as the snow-fall that had lightly powdered her best bonnet on the way to church, and coated the sidewalk an inch thick when she came out of the chapel, increased in weight.

It was a damp snow, as most Brooklyn snows are, hence, a beautiful, trimming the boughs with ermine, and changing the tiniest twig into the semblance of white coral. It muffled footfalls upon the stones, the roll of carriages and the tinkle of horse-car bells. Nurse William's one personal extravagance was an open grate-fire in her sitting-room, and she added a generous lump of coal before drawing up her chair to the round table set in the middle of the room. It was one more visible manifestation of the gratitude bubbling over the brim of her heart.

She asked a blessing aloud (she had never learned to call it "a grace," being an humble soul), bowing a chastened countenance over the hands joined under the edge of the hot plate awaiting a help of the little brown turkey.

"Our Father who art in heaven! bless to our use the food thou hast provided for our use upon this happy, happy Thanksgiving day, and may we draw from it strength to do and to bear thy holy will. Have mercy upon the poor, and incline the hearts of the rich to be liberal unto them, as thou, Lord, hast been to them. We ask all for our Saviour's sake! Amen!"

In secret prayer, she always said "we" and "our" and "us." In rising heavenward, her thoughts and sympathies broadened too much to be confined to the first person singular.

It was a bountiful first person, and pity it was, and is, that the sample should be so singular in a world where man so needs bountifulness of mercy and largeness of Christian charity. She was five feet four-and-a-half in height, and weighed one hundred and sixty pounds. To look at her cheeks where winter roses bloomed healthfully, the kindly mouth, the well-opened gray eyes that looked straight and never boldly into yours, at the plump capable hands, the backs of which, together with her wrists, were dimpled like a baby's—you would have agreed with me that she could not in the natural fitness of things, bear any name but that of "Mary," and that the honest every-dailiness of "Williams" finished it off as a twilled galloon binding a substantial jacket. She wore a small cap over the abundant gray hair, a cap with a fluted lace border, and a bow of inch-wide pink ribbon just above the somewhat wide tract between the eyebrows. Her gown was of a sensible shade of gray, darker than her hair. About her waist, compact, albeit not small, a full white apron was tied behind with broad starched strings. The apron had capacious pockets, and when she was on professional duty the pockets had so much to do with the "&c." that I should never get to the middle of my narrative were I to begin to descant upon their properties and uses.

That turkey should have been photographed in two shades of brown, and done duty upon Thanksgiving bills-of-fare, as the bird of gracious plenty. Nurse Williams was the very princess of caterers to people of slender appetites, and patients with no appetites at all, a firm believer in "kitchen-physic," as many knew to their comfort and profit. Her jellies were always clear, and consistent, without being tough, she made tea with boiling water and did not let stand in the pot until it drew all the bitterness out of the leaves; she understood to perfection the art of keeping the juice in chops and steaks; she knew as many ways of cooking eggs as she had varieties of broths; her dry toast was never scorched, and her cream-toast was a revelation of deliciousness. The tiny dish—a mere saucer—of so-called mashed potatoes, flanking the picturesque turkey upon one side, had not in truth been mashed at all, but whipped to a soufflé with a spoonful of hot cream in which a bit of butter was melted. A coffee-pot that might, for size, have belonged to a toy tea-set, was upon the hob, the dry ground coffee within it, warming into willingness to give up all its aroma by the time the boiling water should be poured in.

The lady came and brought me money for clothes and shoes for the children." Still others—"They sent me a turkey, and flour, and O, so many good things! Won't you thank them?" This was the chorus of all.

"You will not wonder when I tell you that with all our resources, we filled two hundred and thirty baskets, and gave a number whose baskets we could not fill, some twenty cents and fifty cents, so they could get a little of something. Perhaps you will say, 'Where did you get the money for all these?' From the Lord's stewards, some from one place, some from another. Two friends send from England, each year one from Scotland, one from Denver, one from Boston, one from Philadelphia, the rest from our own city; for we have noble men and women here and although each year the Master calls some of my helpers home, others are raised up. Thus the past two years you have been sent to fill the place of some who have gone and are resting from their labors. Praise the Lord! I tell them the work is his, not ours, and to him we look for help to carry it on.

"Thanking you, dear sir, for the help given I am yours sincerely, BELLA COOKE."

Mrs. Cooke, after thirty-eight years of confinement, grows old very gracefully, lying in her sick-chamber. The two windows are full of flowers, the carpets are bright and warm in color, the book cases are full of volumes that tell of the love of the Saviour who has done so much for the invalid, the whole apartment has an air of inviting cheerfulness, and its occupant's heart is filled to overflowing with gratitude to God. Many a time during her long years of illness she has been at death's door, or as she herself expresses it, "very near home." "Ah, sister," remarked her physician, one morning on greeting her after a night which he had not expected her to survive, "those feet have a hard time getting over Jordan." "Yes," came back the cheery reply from the bed, "and I see you try to keep them back as long as you can."

"Many souls have been born anew in this little room," she said to the writer when he visited her a few days ago, "and I would not desire to leave it till my time comes. Here, too, some of our best-known city ladies have uttered their first audible prayer to the Saviour. Ah, no!" and she looked around the apartment, "I would not care to exchange it for another until I reach the heavenly mansions."

Bella Cooke was born in Hull, England, in 1821, her father being John Beeton and her mother Elizabeth Smawfield. Both parents were devoted followers of Christ, and they were very happy in their married life. Bella at the age of nine began to be troubled about the state of her soul. Her first gleams of Christ's free salvation came to her after several weeks of worshipping at a little Methodist Chapel, in Norfolk Street, Sheffield; but it was not till the spring of 1834 that she really saw the light that has since been her Guide and Comforter, amid all her trials and sorrows.

When she was about seventeen years old, she began to take an active share in the work of the Master. She still recalls with deep interest those early experiences, when she undertook home missionary work among the poor of Sheffield, her district being known as "The Isle," a vicious quarter, very much like the old Five Points of New York.

She was married in Sheffield, and one of the first stipulations of Mr. Cook, her husband, and to which she gladly assented, was that their house should be the "Preachers' Home," whenever the men of God came that way. Their wedded life was an exceedingly happy one, and several children were born to them. Her husband's property was dissipated by the dishonesty of other men, and misfortunes came rapidly upon the little household. In 1847, on account of repeated losses in business, they came to New York. Poverty continued to oppress them, but with added misfortunes came an increase in spirituality. It seemed as though God was pouring out his riches in their hearts in proportion as the world denied its favors. In 1849 came the cholera visitation, which swept off hundreds in New York. Mr. Cooke fell a victim to the plague after a few hours' illness. The widow, left with several small children, one born shortly after her husband's death, was now in sore straits, yet her confidence in her heavenly Father never faltered. Her old spinal trouble, aggravated by all the sufferings she had undergone, again began to assert itself. Yet for several hours daily she visited among the poor patients in Bellevue Hospital, and in the tenements along First Avenue from Twenty-eighth Street, and along Third Avenue and other sections of the populous

East side. Charitably disposed persons supplied the means to carry on this voluntary mission among the poor, sending her both clothing and money. Summer and winter she went in and out among the swarming tenements like a ministering angel. At last the burdened body gave way, and in 1855 Bella Cooke took to her bed, having been pronounced incurable by the doctors.

Then began an experience that gave to the world "a humble heroine of the Cross." Racked day and night by keen physical suffering, she yet determined to persevere in the good work she had begun. In her little room at 492 2d Ave. she gathered around her many of the most godly men and women in New York. Many clergymen and laymen have loved to meet there, and have declared that the Spirit of the Lord was in that little room, and that they always went forth stronger for the duties of life after calling there. The imprisoned invalid became not only a missionary and a comforter, but a material benefactor as well. To the Twenty-seventh Street Methodist Church, of which she had been a member forty-three years, she has given liberally, on one occasion contributing $100 from her own slender means. Her "poor list" is as large as that of many a successful church, and is as faithfully supplied. Among those ladies who loved to aid her in this work were Mrs. A. G. Phelps, Mrs. Stokes, Miss Phelps, Mrs. Ellis, Mrs. Newman, Mrs. Delamater, Mrs. Onativia, Mrs. Clarkson, Mrs. W. E. Dodge, Mrs. Jaffray, Mrs. Murray, and Mrs. Huntington, and she has been visited at times by Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Sherman, Mrs. Field, Mrs. Stillman, Mrs. Stuyvesant, Miss Hamersly, Mrs. F. W. Vanderbilt, Miss Schiefflin and many others whose names are well known in the world of society, and who made her the distributor of their secret charities. Her beautiful life and deeds of kindness will live in the memories of thousands long after she has passed away.

MATABELE WITCHCRAFT.

Matabele natives conspire against a rich man. They lay their plans, tip the witch-doctor, and set about killing him. They go to the chief and lay their case before him somewhat after this fashion: "We are troubled with much sickness, people are dying, cattle are dying, owls are flying about, snakes are appearing, we are bewitched by some one." The chief may ask by whom, then they give the man's name (the poor innocent man who knows nothing at all about the business), after which the chief refers them to the great smeller-out, the witch-doctor of the country. On arriving at his hut this great doctor, who already has been presented with an ox, knows very well whom to select as the victim. He goes through certain performances, and after much noise and nonsense, picks out this poor man who is absolutely ignorant of the crafty, wicked plot of his neighbors and friends. The victim protests against the decision of the witch-doctor, declares his innocence in front of them all, but the wily witchman, when he sees all the others are with him, upholds his verdict. The unhappy man thus accused, returns as a criminal to the chief, and swears by Umzilikazi and everybody else, that he knows nothing whatever about these charges; but now all are opposed to him, he pleads alone in front of the king, for whose final decision they wait. It may be, "cast him to the wolves," then and there, or a command to kill him at his own town.

THE BELIEVER'S STANDING.

I STAND; but not as once I did,
Beneath my load of guilt;
The blessed Jesus bore it all—
For me his blood was spilt.
Oh! bless the Lord! Exalt his name!
He gave himself for me;
He died upon Mount Calvary's cross,
To set poor sinners free.

I stand; but not beside the grave
Where once my Lord did lie;
The cross and grave are left behind,
And Christ is gone on high.
Oh! bless the Lord! He buried sin!
He left it in the grave;
And he has proved himself the strong,
Who died, and rose to save.

I stand; e'en now where he appears,
In union with my Lord,
In him I'm saved. O wondrous thought!
I read it in his Word.
Oh! bless the Lord! with him I'm one,
In him we are complete;
We live by faith! but soon in sight,
Our coming Christ we'll greet.

THE DIGNITY OF HONEST LABOR.

A United States Senator who began life as a carpenter, was "diligent in business." But he used to say, "I will not always be a carpenter," for it seemed he had set his heart upon sometime entering the legal profession. He did not slight his carpenter's work for his day dreams of what he should do and become, but was noted for his honest, conscientious labor. One day the young man was planing a board that was to become a part of a "judge's bench," when a friend, observing his painstaking, inquired: "Why you take so much pains to smooth that board?" Instantly the young carpenter replied, "Because I want a smooth seat when I come to sit on it." His friend laughed, and thought the joke so good that he reported it in the shop, and the young man was bantered not a little about the "judge's bench." He always replied, good-naturedly: "Wait and see. He laughs who wins, and I may sit there yet." And he did; but the distance between the carpenter's and the judge's bench was paved with heroic struggle and self-sacrifice.

THE HIDDEN BIBLE.

During the recent persecution of Christians in Madagascar, a consultation was held as to where they should hide the Bible, and at last they agreed that the safest place would be in the smallpox hospital. The Queen had search made everywhere, but no Bible could be found. At last one of the messengers came to where it was hidden. "I suppose you know," they said to him, "that this is the smallpox hospital." The messenger turned back in alarm, and the Bible was saved. That book is now in the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society in London. When the Queen heard that Razaka, one of the converted natives, was the leader of the meeting, he was searched for and hunted. It was thought that he had fled to the Sakalara tribe, 700 miles distant; but all the time he was hid in the smallpox hospital. His wife took rice to him during the night, and he lay there and read and re-read the Bible, till he became himself an animated Bible.

CONVERTED BY A VISION.

A godly English soldier, Colonel Gardener, was converted in a remarkable manner. As a young man, he was notorious, even in an ungodly camp, for his vice. One evening, while contemplating the commission of a gross sin, he took up Watson's "Heaven Taken by Storm," to pass away the time; and while thus engaged, he thought he saw an unusual blaze of light fall on the book he was reading, which he thought might happen by some accident in the candle. But lifting up his eyes he apprehended, to his extreme amazement, that there was before him, as it were suspended in the air, a visible representation of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the Cross, surrounded on all sides with a glory; and was impressed, as if by a voice, or something like a voice, had come to him to this effect, for he was not confident as to the very words: "O sinner! did I suffer this for thee, and are these thy returns?" He sunk down in his chair, and continued, he knew not exactly how long, insensible. From that hour he felt himself a guilty creature, and believing on him whom his sins had pierced, obtained pardon.

HE DELAYED TOO LONG.

A few years ago, writes a clergyman, I was preaching in Scotland, and during the time of my visit I resided with a zealous and godly minister. Alas, poor man, like Eli and many other men of God, he was afflicted with an ungodly son, who was on the highway to ruin. He drank, and betted, and went to the theatre, and behaved in such a manner that, between grief and shame, he brought his mother's grey head in sorrow to the grave. His father asked me to speak to him and I took the first opportunity of doing so. He was a young fellow, about twenty-three years of age, and he said he was far too young to go in for religion yet. Wait till he got a little older. "You are not too young to go to the theatre," I replied; "not too young to get drunk, not too young to swear and blaspheme, and you may find you are not too young to die." But he would not surrender his pleasures and come to Christ. "Excuse me," he said, "I have an engagement to-night that I must keep, but to-morrow I promise you I will go to the Union Hall and give myself to Christ."

That was the last time I saw him in life. He was not home when the family retired to rest. The gas was left burning for his convenience, but in the morning it was found he had not returned, and the gas blazed on. The housekeeper going out for some things early in the morning found the young man lying half-way down the stairs, dead. Coming home late at night from his amusement, the hand of death had struck him. For him there had been no to-morrow, no more convenient season; and for you, my unconverted friend, there may be no to-morrow. We preachers cannot promise salvation to-morrow. God says: "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation," and if you harden your hearts, it is at your peril.

The Tomb of Cain.

HERE are few countries that possess a greater interest for the student of antiquity than Persia and the adjacent territories. There are numerous structures of great age, some of them mausoleums, others temples, and still others towers, whose remains have been wonderfully preserved through many centuries. One of the most remarkable is in the region known as Sarakhs, in ancient Merv, where the pilgrim is shown a venerable building which the guides declare to be the tomb of Cain. It is evidently a structure of great antiquity; but beyond the mere assertion, based on local tradition, nothing can be found to support the statement that the gray and time-worn pile, with its peculiar shape and dome-like roof, is what it pretends to be. The district around Merv abounds in ruins. No less than four cities have flourished on or near the site of Old Merv. The most ancient is Giaour Kala, and is said to date from the time of Zoroaster. It was a satrapy of Darius, and is connected with the very beginning of Persian history. The ruins of the city next in antiquity are called Iskander Kala, after Alexander the Great, who made it one of his colonies. Of these two cities little remains above ground except some high walls. The third of the cities was built by the Arabs who conquered the place in the 7th century, and of this Merv, now called Sandjar Kala, there remain two or three monuments indicative of considerable greatness. In the 16th century the Persians took the place and built a fourth city, the walls of which, flanked with semi-circular towers, and measuring possibly two or three miles round, are now called Bairam Ali. Here the ruins are most plentiful. The entire district is now under Russian control.

A FORGIVING KAFFIR.

A missionary relates the following incident: "A settler in South Africa, who lived some distance up the country, one day found a native lurking about his stable. He accused the man of trying to steal a horse. The captive reiterated his innocence, and explained that he was making home to his kraal. Despite his frantic struggles and efforts to escape, the poor Kafir was dragged to a tree, and there, with one blow of an ax, his right hand was severed from the wrist. It was about three months after this tragic event that the settler found himself benighted while still far away from his home. A tall native desired him to enter, and food was placed before him. Next morning when he rose to depart, his host confronted him; and holding up his right arm asked the white man if he knew it. The squatter turned pale—the hand was gone! He knew that he had been at the mercy of the man he had treated so cruelly. The Kafir continued, 'You were in my power. I could have killed you. Revenge said, 'Kill the man who has harmed you for life,' but I replied, 'No; I am a Christian, and I will forgive.'

THE GOSPEL IN SYRIA.

Syria contains 7,000 square miles and a population of 2,078,300. The Presbyterian mission in Syria, writes Dr. S. M. Davis, has eighty stations and out-stations, thirty-nine missionaries, fourteen ordained and twenty-five lay—one man and twenty-four women; 222 native workers, four ordained, forty-one licentiate, 177 helpers; twenty-six churches with 1,806 members, 140 added last year, 88 regular preaching-places with congregations aggregating 4,784; 149 boys and 192 girls in boarding-schools; 4,749 boys and 1,850 girls in day schools; total, 145 schools and 6,629 pupils; 89 Sabbath Schools with 2,431 scholars; 192 young women in training for missionary teaching. The educational and presswork connected with this mission are among its peculiarities and sources of promise. There are one college, one medical school, one theological seminary, three female seminaries; there are 483 publications, 65,200 volumes printed during the year, making 23,279, 850 pages, 13,324,850 pages of Scriptures, making in all from the beginning, 465,430,607 pages.

THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM.

As we leave this ill-famed ravine, writes Charles A. Dana, in "McClure's Magazine," and turn toward the east, the lofty wall of Jerusalem and the massive towers of the citadel are immediately before us. We are on the outer slope of Mount Zion, the sanctuary and the abode of David! The ponderous blocks which form the lower strata of the wall might have been shaped and put in place by some prehistoric race of giants. More than almost anything else to be found around Jerusalem, or within, this wall bears an appearance of great antiquity. We can easily believe that its foundations were laid in the time of David, though its upper portions are unquestionably modern. The books vary. One says it was the work of Sultan Suleiman in the sixteenth century; another, that it was erected much earlier; and my guide, a most intelligent and well-informed Jew of Hungarian origin, told me that it was built by the Crusaders after they had got possession, for the purpose of protecting the inhabitants against the rascally Arabs, who would ride up in small parties, rob some rich family, and be off with their plunder before anything could be done to stop them. But, however this may be, the wall, from sixteen to twenty feet in height, fully encloses the town; and although it could soon be knocked to pieces by a ten-pounder cannon, it stands in good order, solid enough for all peaceful purposes, and perfectly separates the city from the country.

KEEPING FAITH.

Sir William Napier was one day taking a long country walk, when he met a little girl about five years old sobbing over a broken bowl. She had dropped and broken it in bringing it back from the field to which she had taken her father's dinner, and said she would be beaten on her return home for having broken it. As she said this, a sudden gleam of hope seemed to cheer her. She innocently looked up into Sir William's face and said, "But you can mend it, can't you?" He explained that he could not mend the bowl, but the trouble he could overcome by the gift of a sixpence to buy another. However, on opening his purse, it was empty of silver, and he promised to meet his friend on the same spot at the same hour the next day, and to bring sixpence with him.

On his return home, Sir William found an invitation awaiting him to dine in B—, on the following evening, to meet some one whom he especially wished to see. He hesitated for some little time, trying to calculate the possibility of giving the meeting to his friend of the broken bowl, and still being in time for the dinner-party at B—; but, finding this could not be, he wrote a letter to decline accepting the invitation, on the plea of a "previous engagement," saying, "I cannot disappoint her; she trusted me."

ANOTHER YEAR.

(Written for The Christian Herald.)

CAN it be that another year has rolled Into Eternity? [hold] Tell me, my friends, what does it In its sealed up records for thee? Is it laden with deeds of kindness You have done through each passing day, Of the love you have given to aching hearts, In the hour of sorrow's sway? Have you struggled against the tempter? To your Master's words given heed? And through bright and stormy weather Endeavored his lambs to feed? Have you flitted from flower to flower! And wasted the moments fleet? Enjoying the world's gay pleasures, And sipping its honey sweet?

Ah, me! if we could but recall them— Those wasted hours sublime— If we could but bring them back again, From Eternity into time!

But the old year has gone, and our records Stand for or against us, there, And we pray thee, Heavenly Father, To forgive the sins they bear. S.

HUMAN SACRIFICES IN RUSSIA.

VERY few persons in Europe, or elsewhere, are aware that human sacrifices still exist in a part of the Russian Empire. The fact is, nevertheless, certain, says a writer in the Yakutsk Gazette, (a Siberian journal). Among the Tchukchis such sacrifices still take place, and seem likely to be practised for a long time to come. At the same time, no blame therefor can be attached to the Russian Government or the Orthodox Church, for efforts by both to stop the custom have proved ineffectual. The sacrifices alluded to, are those of old people and the sick, who, finding no pleasure in life, resolve to have done with earthly existence and rejoin their dead relations. The Tchukchi, who has made up his mind to die, immediately notifies his neighbors and nearest friends. The news spreads in the circle of his friends, and all of them soon visit the unhappy person, to influence him to change his mind. Prayers, reproaches, complaints and tears have no effect on the man, who explains his reasons, speaks of the future life, of the dead who appear to him in his sleep, and even when he is awake, calling him to them. His friends, seeing him thus resolved, go away to make the customary preparations. At the end of from ten to fifteen days, they return to the hut of the Tchukchi, with white mortuary garments and some weapons which will be used by the man in the other world to fight evil spirits and hunt the reindeer. After making his toilette, the Tchukchi withdraws into a corner of the hut. His nearest relative stands by his side, holding in his hand the instrument of sacrifice, a knife, a pike, or a rope. If the Tchukchi has chosen the knife, two of his friends hold him under the arms and by the wrists, and, at a given signal, the sacrificer thrusts the knife into his breast. If the pike has been chosen, two of his friends hold that weapon, and two others throw the victim on its point. For strangulation, the rope is put about his neck and the sacrificers draw it until death ensues. Then the assistants go to the corpse, reddening their hands and face with its blood, and place it on a sledge drawn by reindeer, which draws it to the place of the funeral. Arrived at their destination, the Tchukchis cut the throat of the reindeer, take from the dead body its clothing which is torn in pieces, and place the corpse on a lighted funeral-pile. During the incineration, the assistants offer up prayer to the happy in the other world, and supplicate these to watch over them and theirs. These horrible practices are followed to-day with the same exactness as in ancient times. The Tchukchis, the Lamouts and the Russians, invited to these sacrifices, often take part in them, although there is no example of one of them having taken the same road to reach the other world.

EXPOSING THE FETISH.*

KWESI KUMA had not yet become a Christian, but he was so alarmed at the intrigues of his order that he was resolved to give his aid in an entire exposure of the practices with which he himself had been too long connected. He accused the priests of the great oracle of being the cause of Edu resisting the authorities and bringing the country to the verge of ruin. Producing a great sensation, he declared, too, that since their arrival at Cape Coast, they had been plotting the death by poison of three influential persons, whom he mentioned by name.

Edu, the chief, offered a very weak defence. The governor and council of Europeans, enlightened natives and pagan chiefs, retired to consult on the case. The former decision of fine and compensation was confirmed. In addition to this, however, Edu was bound over to obedience to the English Government and to keep the peace with the Christians. As a guarantee of good behavior, he was ordered to lodge in the castle, for the space of three years, fifty ounces of gold dust, value one hundred and eighty pounds sterling.

After the evidence of Kwesi Kuma in reference to the conspiracy, nearly the whole troop of priests were taken into custody preparatory to a strict investigation. A few days after, the affair was inquired into.

The case was opened in the great hall, in the presence of Edu and the chiefs. The evidence was clear and convincing. Several of these deceivers confessed that their fetish was nothing but their own wicked intrigues and an utter delusion. On account of the great crimes of which they were convicted, several were sentenced to be publicly flogged and to work in irons for the space of five years. The chiefs were indignant that they had been so long duped, and the evidence clearly showed that their national religion consisted in nothing but the intrigues and villainy of such men as they saw before them. They gave their hearty assent to the punishment appointed. Leaving the castle saddened and excited, they asked: "What shall we do now when we get rich?" then adding, as though a hopeful solution had suggested itself, "We had better all go to school together."

The execution of one part of the sentence on the convicted priests was not long delayed. These unhappy deluders of their countrymen had the measure of their disgrace filled up by being publicly flogged before the castle gates for their conspiracy to poison certain individuals. On that day the greatest contempt was shown for these men by those who till recently believed them to be holy ministers of their most sacred oracle.

So Christianity came out of the fire tried and purified, while the greatest disgrace fell upon the fetishism. The sacred grove, no longer venerated, was regarded as the scene of dark abominations and wicked intrigues; and eventually it fell under the woodman's axe and was cleared.

The chief, Edu, returned to Mankessim, dejected and vexed that he had been made the dupe of such men. As usual he went to consult the oracle, and the great Bosum answered out of the darkness as heretofore. But the suspicious chief had placed men in ambush, who suddenly pounced upon the spot whence the mysterious voice proceeded and captured the speakers, who were no gods, but men no better than the rest of men about him. For the mystery there was no longer respect or fear. The angry chiefs at once put these priests in irons and kept them prisoners, somewhat gratified that he could bring upon their heads a little of the shame which he had been made to feel in formerly championing their cause. This exposure of the fetish clergy known as the Brafo was a heavy blow at the fetish, and was a circumstance of the greatest importance to the spread and establishment of Christianity. There was at once a great desire for the teaching of the Gospel on all sides.

HEAVEN'S KINGDOM HERE.†

What is the kingdom of heaven to which Christ refers? Not a kingdom of heaven beyond the grave and in some other world, but a kingdom of heaven here, on the earth, which those who trust in riches are liable to miss and not enter. And why? Because they are apt to trust too much in riches, to make them their heaven, their only heaven; and to want no other heaven and by and by to think there is no other. In trying hard to minister to their physical needs, their physical wants and requirements, duties, pleasures, interests and gratifications of appetite, they are apt to overlook and ignore their higher ends and greater, to forget indeed they have any higher ends, and after a while to cease altogether—the soul lost, dead—to cease altogether to feel them.

Are we not beginning to find out a little, that this materialistic life, however comely and fair, which moves and finds its being and its gratifications in the physical senses, is breaking down under its own weight and is not giving to men the happiness that they had expected from it? Are we not beginning to find that the physical treasures of life are not the only treasures nor the greatest; that there are treasures in the mind, treasures in the heart, treasures in the soul, which if diligently sought may be abundantly had, and which if missed, leave us poor indeed?

There is a kingdom of heart culture, pure, sweet, of great reward, to be found more particularly in the sheltered and secluded life of the home. How hard it is for a busy man of affairs to-day to enter that kingdom! How much he will lack if he does not! There is a heaven of soul culture, of spiritual grace and beauty, of spiritual strength and refinement and delicacy of spiritual perception, to which new vistas open, new hopes arise, new faiths appear, new glories are made to shine, brighter than the pride of life, sweeter than the lust of the flesh, and of a more enduring brilliancy than all the material splendors revealed to the natural eye. There is a heaven in the soul here, the assurance of a heaven for the soul hereafter: a heaven of trust and confidence in, and a heaven of peace with God; how hard it is for the man engrossed in material pursuits to enter that kingdom of heaven!

VIEWS OF IMMORTALITY.‡

A human interest is lent to Kant's reasoning by his bearing as death drew near. This memorable utterance of his is recorded: "I do not fear to die. I assure you, as in the presence of God, that if on this very night, suddenly, the summons to death were to reach me, I should bear it with calmness; I should raise my hands to heaven and say, 'Blessed be God!'"

After Bishop Butler had spoken of his awe at appearing before the Righteous One, his chaplain, in those last moments, repeated the words, "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." "Ah, this is comfortable," he said; and with this utterance upon his tongue he entered the life eternal. Such a scene, so raised above animal fears and pains, so full of awe and trust, so utterly sure of God and the soul's undying relation to him, so sublimely aware of the momentousness of the mysterious change, serves to render even more impressive and powerful the results of Butler's thought upon the life everlasting.

There is about the doomed philosopher, Socrates, an air of deep composure. He is facing death in cheerfulness and confident faith, and his mood is to his friends an utter mystery. They cannot understand how he does not fear to die; they ask him to explain the ground of his courage. "Did I not think," he answered, "that I should go to dwell in the company not only of gods wise and good, but next also men that have died better than those here on earth, I should be wrong in not feeling sorry at my approaching death. But, as it is, be assured that I trust to join the society not only of good men, but that I shall go to abide with God." "Socrates," said one of his friends, "surely you do not mean to depart and keep this belief to yourself, without letting us share it with you?" Thus it happens that the day between sunrise and sunset, the long and lovely Greek day, the last of Socrates in the prison, the last of the thinker with his friends, is spent in giving his reasons for the faith that is in him.

THE RUNAWAY PERAMBULATOR.‡

Leigh was some little way off still; but nearer than he, and coming nearer every instant, was something else which made even Janie's stout little heart rise up to her mouth, as she afterward said. It was the perambulator from the Hall, the beautiful new perambulator, banging and dashing along, dragged by something that looked just then very like a little wild beast instead of a well-disposed tame doggie. And yet it was only looks, for Fuzzy was in the best of spirits, quite pleased with himself, and thinking that Leigh's shouts only meant he was to go faster and faster.

But Janie had not much time to think anything. She only saw that the perambulator was not empty; she only took in that it must be stopped. She would not have been frightened, even if she had thought the dog was mad, for she was very brave. But she knew that her voice would have no power over him, and she made her plan in a moment. Just as the wildly excited dog came close to her—luckily just then he was going pretty evenly—she threw herself in his way, which made him slacken his pace, and then, somehow or other, she got hold of the edge of the carriage, holding on to it with all her strength, and she was very strong for her size. And then—what happened exactly she could not tell—fancy Fuzzy must have given a bound forward to get rid of this troublesome interruption to his grand race—but before she knew where she was they were all in a jumbled-up heap on the ground, Janie, Baby, Dolly, perambulator and the dog—Fuzzy barking loudly; baby, Janie was thankful to hear, crying and roaring, but, as far as the small sister-nurse could make out, unhurt.

WHEN WRITING TO THIS OFFICE

In order to secure the promptest attention for your communications, please bear in mind that the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is divided into the following three departments, and that communications intended for anyone of these departments should never contain matters of interest to any other department: Subscription Department in which only new subscriptions or renewals are handled. Address Department where all changes or rectifications of name, address or date are made. Complaint Department in which only complaints of irregular delivery receive attention. Communications to two or three departments each written on a separate sheet, may be enclosed in one envelope, but each separate sheet should have reference only to one of these departments.

What to do with Milk Pails!

Clean them with Pearline. You can't get them so thoroughly sweet and pure in any other way. Besides, it's easier for you—quicker, more economical.

"The box and barrel churn are not hard to keep clean. A little hot water and a little Pearline will clean any churn or do away with any bad odor."—The Dairy World, Chicago.

Perhaps you think that some of the imitations of Pearline, that you'd be afraid to use in washing clothes, would do just as well in work like this. They wouldn't hurt tinware, certainly. But they wouldn't clean it, either, half as well as Pearline—besides, "don't play with the fire." If your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES

COPYRIGHT 1894, BY LOUIS KLOPSCH.

NUMBER 2.

REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D., Editor.
Offices, Bible House, New York.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 10, 1894.

PRICE, 5 CENTS.

A GREAT BIBLE REVIVAL!

The Result of "The Christian Herald's" Three Years' Work in Spreading the Gospel.
A Movement without a Parallel.

CHRISTIANITY, its Divine Founder, and its principles as set forth in the inspired Word, have in recent years been subjected to a series of assaults that would have sufficed to wreck any system of religion not grounded on Eternal Truth. These attacks, far from effecting the purpose intended, have aroused Christian communities everywhere to a new and higher appreciation of the Bible as the standard of their faith and the anchor of their hopes, and they have clung to the sacred Book with a divinely-infused zeal and fervor that admit of no misinterpretation. A great wave of Bible revival is sweeping over this Union. Never in the history of the Christian Church in America, has there been so deep and widespread an interest in the Word of God among people of all classes, as prevails at the present time. This unprecedented revival, which has resulted in placing the Bible in countless homes in every city, town, village and hamlet throughout the Union, is, under the blessing of God, directly due to the efforts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Three years ago, the proprietor of this journal, Dr. Louis Klopsch, began to consider the practicability of securing mammoth editions of the best Teachers' Bible, at a price that would render them available out to the subscribers of this journal and their friends, 10,000 New Testaments and 25,000 Teachers' Bibles. This initial effort was followed in 1891 with 26,000 more Teachers' Bibles, and again by 80,000 Teachers' Bibles in 1892. So eager were the people for the Word that arrangements were made to send out a much larger supply during the present season and 100,000 Teachers' Bibles were ordered from England, a very large proportion of which have already been distributed. Such enormous orders at first severely taxed the productive capacities of the manufacturers of these standard Bibles, but for the last two years they have increased their facilities to meet the necessities of so vast an output of sacred literature.

It is scarcely necessary to explain to our readers—already so widely familiar with it—what the Teachers' Bible is. It is the result of the highest and best Christian scholarship, the ripest classical culture, the most thorough research. With the Helps, References, Subject-Index, Maps, Concordance, History of Biblical Antiquities, Harmony, and the vast mine of varied and accumulated information it supplies, the student of the Word who is fortunate in possessing a Teacher's Bible, has at command the equivalent of a complete Theological library, every page and paragraph of which sheds added light on the Divine Book itself. To the teacher it is invaluable; to all others it soon becomes a treasure beyond price. Such a Bible, with its helps and indices is indeed a "Sword of the Spirit." Placed in the hands of hundreds of thousands of our youth, it is equipping them with a spiritual armor that will prove effective in warding off the shafts of infidelity, and will go far toward making the rising generation proof against the insidious assaults of scepticism. If its distribution were multiplied by millions, it would be a still mightier agency for God and the truth. Infidel writers have vauntingly declared that the Bible is losing ground, and that it will ultimately be regarded as a venerable and out-worn tradition. Renan, the famous French apostle of free thought, held a different opinion, when he wrote that the sacred Book would never lose its hold, because it was "the universal consolation of humanity." But the best and most conclusive evidence that the old Book is more than ever loved and cherished, in our own hemisphere at least, is found in the remarkable Bible revival of the past three years. During the present winter, the stream has overflowed its banks and risen to the dimensions of a mighty flood. Lately a number of religious and secular publications, after witnessing with astonishment the great work that has already been accomplished, have followed the example of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by offering Teachers' Bibles as premiums to their subscribers.

As premiums with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, on the easiest terms possible, thus affording all who desired to become more thoroughly acquainted with the Word of God, an opportunity of procuring the result of the very highest Biblical scholarship in compact form at little or no sacrifice.

This was by no means a simple problem. In past years, it is true, Bibles had been offered for sale by several different publications, but invariably under conditions that placed them beyond the reach of the great majority. To begin such a work as was contemplated involved a sacrifice at the very outset; but he resolved to utilize the facilities afforded by the far-reaching circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the work, and at the same time to devote from its income a sufficient amount to enable him to offer Teachers' Bibles at absolute cost, and often below cost, to all who desired them. In 1890, the first step was taken and Dr. Klopsch sent

Among these are the New York "Christian Advocate," "Christian at Work," "Golden Rule," "Christian Intelligencer," "Mid-Continent," "Watchword," "Waverley Magazine," "Christian Standard," "Weekly Witness," "Congregationalist," and several others, which have awakened to the fact that the efforts of this journal had been blessed in producing a most phenomenal revival of popular interest in the Word, (Continued on page 29.)

PREPARING TEACHERS' BIBLES FOR SHIPMENT IN "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S" PREMIUM DEPARTMENT.

THE POOR ALWAYS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle

Text: Matthew 26: 11: "Ye have the poor always with you."

WHO said that? The Christ who never owned anything during his earthly stay. His cradle and his grave were borrowed. Every fig he ate was from someone else's tree. Every drop of water he drank was from someone else's well. To pay his personal tax, which was very small, only thirty-one and a quarter cents, he had to perform a miracle and make a fish pay it. All the heights and depths and lengths and breadths of poverty Christ measured in his earthly experience, and when he comes to speak of destitution, he always speaks sympathetically, and what he said then is as true now: "Ye have the poor always with you."

For six thousand years the bread question has been the active and absorbing question. Witness the people crowding up to Joseph's storehouse in Egypt. Witness the famine in Samaria and Jerusalem. Witness the seven thousand hungry people for whom Christ multiplied the loaves. Witness the uncounted millions of people now living, who, I believe, have never yet had one full meal of healthful and nutritious food in all their lives. Think of the 354 great famines in England. Think of the twenty-five million people under the hoof of hunger year before last in Russia. The failure of the Nile to overflow for seven years in the eleventh century left those regions depopulated. Plague of insects in England. Plague of rats in Madras Presidency. Plague of mice in Essex. Plague of locusts in China. Plague of grasshoppers in America. Devastation wrought by drought, by deluge, by frost, by war, by hurricane, by earthquake, by comets flying too near the earth, by change in the management of national finances, by baleful causes innumerable. I proceed to give you three or four reasons why my text is markedly and graphically true in this year 1894.

The first reason we have always the poor with us, is because of the perpetual overhauling of the tariff question, or, as I shall call it, the Tariffic controversy. There is a need for such a word and so I take the responsibility of manufacturing it. There are millions of people who are expecting that the present Congress of the United States will do something one way or the other to end this discussion. But it will never end. When I was five years of age I remember hearing my father and his neighbors in vehement discussion of this very question. It was high tariff or low tariff or no tariff at all. When your great-grandchild dies at ninety years of age, it will probably be from over-exertion in discussing the tariff. On the day the world is destroyed, there will be three men standing on the post office steps—one a high tariff man, another a low tariff man, and the other a free trade man—each one red in the face from excited argument on this subject. Other questions may get quieted, the Mormon question, the Silver question, the Pension question, the Civil Service question. All questions of Annexation may come to peaceful settlement by the annexation of islands two weeks voyage away and the heat of their volcanoes, conveyed through pipe sunder the sea, made useful in warming our continent, or annexation of the moon, dethroning the Queen of Night, who is said to be dissolute, and bringing the lunar populations under the influence of our free institutions; yea all other questions, national and international, may be settled, but this Tariffic question, never. It will not only never be settled, but it can never be moderately quiet for more than three years at a time, each party getting into power taking one of the four years to fix it up, and then the next party will fix it down. Our finances cannot get well because of too many doctors. It is with sick nations as with sick individuals. Here is a man terribly disordered as to his body. A doctor is called in, and he administers a febrifuge, a spoonful every hour. But recovery is postponed, and the anxious friends call in another doctor, and he says: "What this patient needs is blood-letting; now roll up your sleeve!" and the lancet flashes. But still recovery is postponed, and a homeopathic doctor is called in, and he administers some small pellets, and says: "All the patient wants is rest." Recovery still postponed, the family say that such small pellets cannot amount to much anyhow, and an allopathic doctor is called in, and he says: "What this patient wants is calomel and jalap." Recovery still postponed, a hydropathic doctor is called in, and he says: "What this patient wants is hot and cold baths, and he must have them right away. Turn on the faucet and get ready the shower baths." Recovery still postponed, an eclectic doctor is called in, and he brings all the schools to bear upon the poor sufferer, and the patient, after a brave struggle for life, expires. What killed him? Too many doctors. And that is what is killing our national finances. My personal friends, Cleveland and Harrison and Carlisle and McKinley and Sherman, as talented and lovely and splendid men as walk the earth, all good doctors, but their treatment of our languishing finances is so different that neither treatment has a full opportunity, and under the constant changes it is simply wonderful that the nation still lives. The tariff question will never be settled because of the fact, which I have never heard anyone recognize, but, nevertheless, the fact, that high tariff is best for some people and free trade is best for others. This Tariffic controversy keeps business struck through with uncertainty and that uncertainty results in poverty and wretchedness for a vast multitude of people. If the eternal gab on this subject could have been fashioned into loaves of bread, there would not be a hungry man or woman or child on all the planet. To the end of time, the words of the text will be kept true by the Tariffic controversy: "Ye have the poor always with you."

Another cause of perpetual poverty is the cause alcoholic. The victim does not last long. He soon crouches into the drunkard's grave. But what about his wife and children? She takes in washing, when she can get it, or goes out working on small wages, because sorrow and privation have left her incapacitated to do a strong woman's work. The children are thin-blooded and gaunt and pale and weak, standing around in cold rooms, or pitching pennies on the street corner, and munching a slice of unbuttered bread when they can get it, sworn at by passers-by because they do not get out of the way, kicked onward toward manhood or womanhood, for which they have no preparation, except a depraved appetite and frail constitution, candidates for alm-house and penitentiary. Whatever other causes of poverty may fail, the saloon may be depended on to furnish an ever-increasing throng of paupers. Oh, ye grog-shops of Brooklyn and New York and of all the cities! Ye mouths of hell! when will ye cease to craunch and devour? There is no danger of this liquor business failing. All other styles of business at times fail. Dry goods stores go under. Hardware stores go under. Grocery stores go under. Harness-makers fail, druggists fail, bankers fail, butchers fail, bakers fail, confectioners fail, but the liquor dealers never. It is the only secure business I know of. Why the permanence of the alcoholic trade? Because, in the first place, the men in that business, if tight up for money, only have to put into large quantities of water more strychnine and logwood and nuxvomica and vitriol and other congenial concomitants for adulteration. One quart of the real genuine pan-demoniac elixir will do to mix up with several gallons of milder damnation. Beside that, these dealers can depend on an increase of demand on the part of their customers. The more of that stuff they drink, the thirstier they are. Hard times, which stop other businesses, only increase that business, for men go there to drown their troubles. They take the spirits down to keep their spirits up. There is an inclined plane down which alcoholism slides its victims. Claret, champagne, port, cognac, whiskey, Tom and Jerry, sour mash, on and down until it is a sort of mixture of kerosene oil, turpentine, toadstools, swill, essence of the horse blankets and general nastiness. With its red sword of flame, that liquor power marshals its procession, and they move on in ranks long enough to girdle the earth, and the procession is headed by the nose-bloated, nerve-shattered, rheum-eyed, lip-bloated, soul-scorched inebriates, followed by the women, who, though brought up in comfortable homes, now go limping past with aches and pains and pallor and hunger and woe, followed by their children, bare-foot, uncombed, freezing, and with a wretchedness of time and eternity seemingly compressed in their agonized features. "Forward, march!" cries the liquor business to that army without banners. Keep that influence moving on and you will have the poor always with you. Report comes from one of the cities, where the majority of the inhabitants are out of work and dependent on charity, yet last year they spent more in that city for rum than they did for clothing and groceries.

Another warranty that my text will prove true in the perpetual poverty of the world is the wicked spirit of improvidence. A vast number of people have such small income that they cannot lay by in savings bank or life insurance one cent a year. It takes every farthing they can earn to spread the table and clothe the family and educate the children, and if you blame such people for improvidence, you enact a cruelty. On such a salary as many clerks and employees and many ministers of religion live, and on such wages as many workmen receive, they cannot, in twenty years, lay up twenty cents. But you know and I know many who have competent income and could provide somewhat for the future, who live up every dollar, and when they die, their children go to the poor house or on the street. By the time the wife gets the husband buried, she is in debt to the undertaker and gravedigger for that which she can never pay. While the man lived he had his wine parties and fairly stunk with tobacco, and then expired, leaving his family upon the charities of the world. Do not send for me to come and conduct the obsequies and read over such a carcass the beautiful liturgy: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord," for, instead of that, I will turn over the leaves of the Bible to First Timothy, 5th chapter, 18th verse, where it says: "If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel," or I will turn to Jeremiah, 22nd chapter, 10th verse, where it says: "He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem." I cannot imagine any more unfair or meaner thing than for a man to get his sins pardoned at the last minute, and then go to heaven and live in a mansion, and go riding about in a golden chariot over the golden streets, while his wife and children, whom he might have provided for, are begging for cold victuals at the basement door of an earthly city. It seems to me there ought to be a poorhouse somewhere on the outskirts of heaven, where those guilty of such improvidence should be kept for a while on thin soup and gristle, instead of sitting down at the King's banquet. It is said that the church is a Divine institution and I believe it. Just as certainly are the savings banks and the life insurance companies Divine institutions. As out of evil good often comes, so out of the doctrine of probabilities, calculated by Professor Huguens and Professor Pascal for games of chance, came the calculation of the probabilities of human life as used by life insurance companies, and no business on earth is more stable or honorable, and no mightier mercy for the human race has been born since Christ was born. Bored beyond endurance for my signature to papers of all sorts, there is one style of paper that I always sign with a feeling of gladness and triumph, and that is a paper which the life insurance company requires from the clergyman after a decease in his congregation, in order to the payment of the policy to the bereft household. I always write my name then so they can read it. I cannot help but say to myself: "Good for that man to have looked after his wife and children after earthly departure. May he have one of the best seats in heaven!" Young man! The day before or the day after you get married, go to a life insurance company of established reputation and get the medical examiner to put the stethoscope to your lungs and his ear close up to your heart, with your vest off, and have signed, sealed and delivered to you a document that will, in the case of your sudden departure, make for that lovely girl the difference between a queen and a pauper. I have known men who have had an income of $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 a year, who did not leave one farthing to the surviving household. Now that man's death is a defalcation, an outrage, a swindle. He did not die; he absconded. There are a hundred thousand people in America to-day a-hungered through the sin of improvidence. "But," say some, "my income is so small I cannot afford to pay the premium on a life insurance." Are you sure about that? If you are sure, then you have a right to depend on the promise in Jeremiah, 4th chapter, 11th verse: "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in me." But if you are able to, remember you have no right to ask God to do for your household that which you can do for them yourself.

Another fact that you may depend upon for perpetual poverty is the incapacity of many to achieve a livelihood. You can go through any community and find good people with more than usual mental calibre, who never have been able to support themselves and their households. They are a mystery to us, and we say: "I do not know what is the matter with them, but there is a screw loose somewhere." Some of these persons have more brain than thousands who make a splendid success. Some are too sanguine of temperament, and they see bargains where there are none. A common minnow is to them a gold fish, and a quail a flamingo, and a blind mule on a tow-path a Bucephalus. They buy when things are highest and sell when things are lowest. Someone tells them of city lots out West, where the foundation of the first house has not yet been laid. They say, "What an opportunity!" and they put down the hard cash for an ornamented deed for ten lots under water. They hear of a new silver mine opened in Nevada, and they say, "What a chance!" and they take the little money they have in the savings bank and pay it out for as beautiful a certificate of mining stock as was ever printed, and the only thing they will ever get out of the investment is the aforesaid illuminated lithograph. They are honest, brilliant failures. They die poor, and leave nothing to their families but a model of some invention that would not work, and whole portfolios of diagrams of things impossible. I cannot help but like them, because they are so cheerful with great expectations. But their children are a bequest to the Bureau of City Charities. Others administer to the crop of the world's misfortune by being too unsuspecting. Honest themselves, they believe all others are honest. They are fleeced and scalped and vivisected by the sharpers in all styles of business, and cheated out of everything between cradle and grave, and those two exceptions only because they have nothing to do in buying either of them. Others are retained for misfortune by inopportune sickness. Just as that lawyer was to make the plea that would have put him among the strong men of the profession, neuralgia stung him. Just as that physician was to prove his skill in an epidemic, his own poor health imprisoned him. Just as that merchant must be at the store for some decisive and introductory bargain, he sits with a rheumatic joint on a pillow, the room redolent with liniment. What an overwhelming statistic would be the story of men and women and children impoverished by sicknesses. Then the cyclones. Then the Mississippi and Ohio freshets. Then the stopping of the factories. Then the curculios among the peach trees. Then the insectile devastation of potato patches and wheat fields. Then the epizootics among the horses and the hollow horn among the herds. Then the rains that drown out everything and the droughts that burn up half a continent. Then the orange groves die under the white teeth of the hoar frost. Then the coal strikes and the iron strikes and the mechanics' strikes, which all strike labor harder than they strike capital. Then the yellow fever at Brunswick and Jacksonville and Shreveport. Then the cholera at the Narrows, threatening to land in New York. Then the Charleston earthquake. Then the Johnstown flood. Then hurricanes sweeping from Carribean Sea to Newfoundland. Then there are the great monopolies that gully the earth with their oppressions. Then there are the necessities of buying coal by the scuttle instead of the ton, and flour by the pound instead of the barrel, and so the injustices are multiplied. In the wake of all these are overwhelming illustrations of the truth of my text: "Ye have the poor always with you."

Remember a fact that no one emphasizes, a fact, nevertheless, upon which I want to put the weight of an eternity of tonnage, that the best way of insuring yourself and your children and your grandchildren against poverty and all other troubles is by helping others. I am an agent of the oldest insurance company that was ever established. It is near three thousand years old. It has the advantage of all the other plans of insurance; Whole Life Policy, Endowment, and Tontine, and it pays up while you live and it pays up after you are dead. Every cent you give in a Christian spirit to a poor man or woman, every shoe you give to a bare foot, every stick of wood or lump of coal you give to a fireless hearth, every drop of medicine you give to a poor invalid, every star of hope you make to shine over unfortunate maternity, every mitten you knit for cold fingers, is a payment on the premium of that policy. I hand about five hundred million policies to all who will go forth and aid the unfortunate. There are only two or three lines in this policy of Life Insurance. Psalms 41: 1, "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble." Other life insurance companies may fail, but this Celestial Life Insurance Company never. The Lord God Almighty is at the head of it, and all the angels of heaven are in its Board of Direction, and its assets are all worlds, and all the charitable of earth and heaven are the beneficiaries. "But," says someone, "I do not like a Tontine policy so well, and that which you offer is more like a Tontine and to be chiefly paid in this life." "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble." Well, if you prefer the old-fashioned policy of life insurance, which is not paid till after death, you can be accommodated. That will be given you in the day of judgment, and will be handed you by the right hand, the pierced hand, of our Lord himself, and all you do in the right spirit for the poor is payment on the premium of that life insurance policy. I read you a paragraph of that policy: "Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, 'Come ye blessed of my Father, for I was hungry and ye gave me meat, I was thirsty and ye gave me drink, I was a stranger and ye took me in, naked and ye clothed me.'" In various colors of ink other life insurance policies are written. This one I have just shown you is written in only one kind of ink, and that red ink, the blood of the cross. Blessed be God, that is a "Paid-Up Policy," paid for by the pangs of the Son of God, and all we add to it in the way of our own good deeds will augment the sum of eternal felicities. Yes, the time will come when the Banks of largest capital stock will all go down, and the Fire Insurance companies will all go down, and the Life Insurance companies will all go down. In the last great earthquake all the cities will be prostrated, and as a consequence all Banks will forever suspend payment. In the last conflagration the Fire Insurance Companies of the earth will fail, for how could they make appraisement of the loss on a universal fire? Then all the inhabitants of the round world will surrender their mortal existence, and how could Life Insurance Companies pay for depopulated hemispheres? But our Celestial Life Insurance will not be harmed by that continental wreck, or that hemispheric accident, or that planetary catastrophe. Blow it out like a candle—the noon-day sun! Tear it down like worn-out upholstery—the last sunset! Toss it from God's finger like a dewdrop from the anther of a water-lily—the ocean! Scatter them like thisledown before a schoolboy's breath—the worlds! That will not disturb the omnipotence or the composure or the sympathy or the love of that Christ who said it once on earth, and will say it again in heaven to all those who have been helpful to the downtrodden and the cold and the hungry and the houseless and the lost: "Inasmuch as ye did it to them, ye did it to me!"

A TRIBUTE TO A SLAVE.

Near the Black Mingo Baptist Church in Georgetown District, South Carolina, among the tombstones which mark, and will ever make the spot dear to all who may visit the place, one may read the following on a marble slab:

Sacred to the Memory of

"BILL."

A Strictly Honest and Faithful Servant of CLELAND BELIU.

Bill was often entrusted with the care of personal merchandise, to the value of many thousand dollars without loss or damage.

He died on the 7th day of October, 1854, in the thirty-fifth year of his age, and an approved member of the "Black Mingo Baptist Church" of which his master was a Deacon. "Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Erected by his master.

Rev. Dr. Talmage tries a Practical Experiment in Brooklyn, with Good Results—Hungry Thousands Fed.

A WORKER'S PORTION.

WITH over 50,000 idle in New York, fully 10,000 in Brooklyn, and proportionate numbers in all the large cities of the Union, the condition of the honest poor is this winter more deplorable and helpless than it has been at any previous time during a generation. All the regular charitable organizations are taxed beyond their abilities to supply food for the hungry thousands. Many private citizens are taking an active personal interest in the relief work, and instances of noble and spontaneous generosity are multiplied on every side.

There are, however, very many homes where the need is so urgent that it would be an added hardship to compel such cases to await the usual process of investigation followed by the organized charities, before granting the relief desired. Bearing this fact in mind, Rev. Dr. Talmage, who has taken a deep interest in the relief movement, especially in Brooklyn, resolved upon making a personal experiment for the purpose of demonstrating the practicability of immediate aid being rendered to the pinched and hungry thousands. He accordingly constituted himself a relieving officer, and quitting his study in North Oxford street, went to a wholesale butcher establishment on Fulton street, Brooklyn, where he pur-weak with weeks of vain searching for work, women with children in arms and still others dragging at their skirts, aged people, boys and girls with baskets and satchels to carry the meat and bread—all hustled and crowded in their eagerness to secure what would for a day or two at least, stay the pangs of hunger. It was evident,

TO FEED THE HUNGRY MOUTHS AT HOME, from the character and general appearance of the applicants, that they belonged neither to the pauper nor the tramp class, but to the great army of idle unemployed. Some of the women wore veils, as though to avoid recognition. There were not a few who came from East New York and Bushwick, a distance of several miles. In the crowd were several colored people, who were served as promptly and liberally as the rest. None was turned away empty-handed.

Speaking of the reasons that prompted

chased 3,000 pounds of meat, expressly stipulating that there should be "no bones." Next he visited a large bakery nearby and there bought 2,000 loaves of bread. He instructed the baker to begin free distribution of the loaves on Tuesday morning, Dec. 26, and the butcher to distribute the meat on the same day, he promising meanwhile to "send around the customers." There were to be no restrictions: any man, woman or child who should call and ask for a loaf or for a pound or two of fresh beef was to be supplied forthwith and no questions asked.

A simple announcement, following the purchases, sufficed to bring great crowds of the hungry poor to the two stores, long before the hours at which the distribution was to begin. Great piles of juicy beef lay heaped upon the counters when the wholesale meat house opened. Before 10 A. M. over 300 pounds had been given away, the limit being two pounds to each adult, and one pound where the applicant was a child. At the bakery, the fresh loaves disappeared with equal rapidity. Among the applicants were hundreds of workmen of respectable appearance, whose down-cast faces were lightened up for the moment as they gratefully accepted the food which meant so much to those at home. Young shop girls, pale and him to undertake the work, Rev. Dr. Talmage said: "The methods of the charity organizations are excellent in ordinary circumstances, but in a crisis like this, they are too slow. I am impressed with the idea that the thing to be demonstrated, just now, is the shortest road for a loaf of bread from the bakery to the hungry mouth! This is the most practical and quickest method of relieving such suffering as we see around us everywhere.

"Now, I judge everybody by myself. Suppose, though the force of circumstances, that I am in my own house with no bread or meat, what am I to do? My personal pride rebels against appealing for help, and if I need help, there is no place where I could go, without involving an exploration of my house, to inspect my empty bread-plate or to note my fireless hearth. But I don't want any such exploration. If I knew of any place where I could go and get bread without any red tape, and without any questions, I am going to put on my roughest coat and pull my hat down firmly over my eyes and go there and get it."

This object lesson of "immediate and unconditional relief" is already producing a powerful effect on all the agencies now engaged in charity work.

CAIN AND ABEL.

S.S. Lesson for Jan. 21. Gen. 4: 3-13. Golden Text, Heb. 11: 4. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD had created man in his own image: if he had not fallen, the image of God would have been transmitted to his posterity. But it is significantly stated of his third son that Adam "lived a hundred and twenty years, and begat a son in his own likeness and after his image." Why the same was not said of Cain and Abel does not seem clear. In any case our first parents were fallen before any son was born to them. There is little doubt that Eve anticipated in the birth of her son the promised "Seed" who should bruise the head of the serpent: but the self-life to which she had yielded when she fell was the dominant principle still. Was it any wonder that Cain grew up in self-life, and that, in his person, human nature got farther off still from God? A mother cannot, by precept, teach that which her life does not bear witness to. She may rebuke her children for selfishness, but if she is herself selfish, their self-life is nurtured far more by her example than restrained by her precepts. We know that no truth of God is clear to us until it becomes a part of our own life, just so nothing that we teach becomes a power to others but as it is evidenced in our own life. When we see another bearing meekly what we have never borne meekly, we feel ashamed and long to be as we have seen that other. We might forget any number of exhortations, but an example writes itself indelibly upon our memory.

Cain probably had not in his mother the example which might have been a power in his life. He was by occupation "a tiller of the ground," while his brother Abel was "a keeper of sheep." Abel was, from the very first, a type of the Good Shepherd, while Cain's occupation of improving and cultivating the earth was just a type of the earthly minded, the earth worms, who are always occupied with the earth, who whose heart and whose treasure is here below. There is every difference between those who "use this world without abusing it," as our Lord himself did when earning his bread in the carpenter's shop, as Moses did when keeping sheep, as Daniel did in the court of Babylon, and those who, like the rich man in the parable live for earthly things. The first mentioned are "pilgrims and strangers" upon earth, and "they seek a better country, that is, an heavenly; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city," the others have their hopes and their aspirations, their ambitions and their disappointments, their joys and their sorrows, entirely in earthly things. Their position and reputation, their possessions and appearance, their physical and mental enjoyments, these things are the sum total of their lives, and that which is spiritual is so strange to them that, for want of personal experience they look upon it as entirely visionary, and regard those who have real, face to face intercourse with God as silly fanatics.

"Each of the sons of Adam brought after their own order, an offering to the Lord. Cain brought of the fruit of the ground;" he saw himself in his offering, there was no faith in it; it savored of self recommendation. It said: I have bestowed labor on these fruits, I have arranged them upon the altar, I have brought them, they speak of my care, my industry, my devotion; God ought to respond to my goodness, he ought to feel himself under an obligation to me. But God had said to Adam: "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field: in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground: for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." So little did Cain take in the meaning of these solemn words of God that, instead of recognizing and keeping the position of being justly under God's rebuke, and tilling the ground with humble thankfulness, Cain became the father of materialists, who glory in their shame and "mind earthly things." Either not understanding, or else wilfully ignoring God's side of the question, Cain did not inquire as to what God would condescend to receive at the hands of sinful man, consistently with his own honor and holiness: he saw only his own side, that which would recommend him. Such is the offering of all those who do not know the need for and the value of the blood of Christ; and God in his justice and his holiness cannot accept them. Abel's offering was

"By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent offering than Cain, through which he had witness borne to him that he was righteous, God bearing witness in respect of his gifts, and through it he being dead, yet speaketh." "By faith:" faith sees God, recognizes God. With Abel the question was, "What will please God?" He "brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof." The fat of the sin offering, of the trespass offering, and of the peace offering, was to be specially offered to the Lord. May there have been included in Abel's offering the deep humiliation which befits a sinner before God, and then the acknowledgement also of conscious trespasses, as well as the peace offering, testimony to communion between him and his God? It was faith which made the difference between the brothers; the intrinsic value of their offerings was nothing: "Every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills." But God loves to be known and understood. It is a marvel of his grace that he cares for intercourse with his creatures who are so infinitely inferior to him. Abel bowed before God, he identified himself with the slain lamb, and owned that death was his rightful portion, the lamb which "opens not her mouth" spoke nothing of self-assertion, it asserted only the coming Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.

And the Lord had respect to Abel and to his offering; but unto Cain and his offering he had not respect." Abel had witness borne to him that he was righteous, like the publican who went down to his house justified. Something had happened, Abel had met with God, and from an open heaven he knew that he was Held Righteous.

Cain who had asserted himself might have been, and probably was, witness to fire coming down from heaven and consuming the sacrifice of his brother, while his own lay unaccepted and unnoticed upon his altar. No thought of inquiring of the Lord took possession of him; his pride was wounded; he felt wronged; his younger brother was preferred to him.

In his tender love and mercy God sought after Cain. He said unto him: "Why art thou wrath? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt not thou be accepted. And if thou doest not well, sin coucheth at the door, and unto thee is its desire, but thou shalt rule over it." (R.V. margin.) Cain might have been saved had he hearkened to the voice of God, and taken the same way as his brother took to be accepted, but his proud heart would not yield. Blind to his own sin, self-deceived and deceived by the tempter, he took both Abel and Abel's God to be his enemies, one, his believing brother, was within his reach; he rose up against him and slew him! Nothing exasperates the natural man so much as to be convinced that God's children have real intercourse with him. So long as their service to God only manifests their zeal and devotion, and God himself does not come on the scene, the natural man can glory in his religious brother; it is still a glorying in man, he feels that he himself benefits by it, because human nature, his nature has produced it. But when man is nothing and God himself works, when he manifestly answers prayer, when he intervenes and does something which natural law cannot account for, and human nature cannot do—when he utterly transforms one of his children for instance—then the natural man cannot explain it away, and all the enmity of the devil whom he serves is stirred up within him. It was this bitter enmity in the chief priests and Pharisees which would no longer tolerate the Lord Jesus upon earth after the raising of Lazarus from the dead.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ANCIENT ALTARS.

old the brothers were; whether they were instructed as to the nature of the offerings they were expected to bring; why it was that God had "respect" to one and not to the other; how he manifested approval or disapproval; how God talked with Cain; what was the kind of punishment inflicted and a host of other questions. On all these, Scripture is silent. The book was not written to satisfy curiosity, but to teach spiritual and moral lessons which may be practically useful to us in our daily life. There is no other reliable source of information and the teacher will be wise if he refrains from guessing, or discussing hypothetical explanations and devotes himself to the Bible method of drawing from the narrative moral lessons. Here, then, we have the first record of the death of a human being and that death was by murder—the murderer the brother of the victim. Eve was jubilant when Cain was born and declared that she had received him from the Lord. There is no such expression at the birth of Abel. Perhaps she had become doubtful about the origin of her children. She may have seen such symptoms of anger and hatred in Cain as to suggest the doubt whether she had not been mistaken in thinking he had come from the Lord. About their youthful life we are told nothing. There had thus early come to be a division of labor. Cain became like his father a gardener or farmer, while Abel looked after the sheep. The first incident recorded about them is of their bringing offerings. Each, as was natural, brought the product of his own industry. Abel's was accepted and Cain's rejected. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews appears to suggest (Heb. 11: 4), that the cause of the difference was that Cain's offering was simply an expression of thankfulness and that it showed he had no appreciation of his sinful condition. In a word, that he had no faith or he would have offered an animal. Be that as it may, there was some defect and Cain knew what it was. When he became sullen and jealous he was reminded that if he did well he would be accepted, as Abel was. God was not acting capriciously; there was a reason for his being rejected—a reason known to Cain. The opportunity was taken to give him a warning. If he did not mend his ways, if he allowed his sullen disposition to go on unchecked, evil would come of it. Sin was lying at the door ready to spring on him and he had better rule over it. The warning was wasted. Instead of examining himself and conquering himself, he went and told Abel, and as he talked with him, his jealousy and anger grew and he killed him. The warning had come true; sin had mastered him. Cain's retort when questioned as to his crime, "Am I my brother's keeper?" indicated his disposition. Men are asking the same question to-day. What is it to them that multitudes are in want of food and of the spiritual bread of life? Are they to be held responsible? God pleads and warns no longer; he punishes, and, as he listens, Cain exclaims, "my punishment is greater than I can bear!"

Cain was very wrath. It is not uncommon for the angry man to be the one in the wrong. A cobbler at Leyden was fond of attending the public disputations held at the Academy, which were conducted in Latin. He showed a lively interest in the debate, and some one knowing that he understood very little Latin asked him if he could follow the speakers. "No," he said, "but I know who is wrong in the argument." "How?" he was asked. "Oh! that is simple," he said, "by seeing who is angry first."

If thou doest well shalt not thou be accepted also. Cain evidently knew that he was not doing right. God assures him if he is obedient he will be accepted as Abel was. God expects us to have implicit faith in him and to do what he commands, even if we do not see any reason for it. A story is told of a great captain, who, after the battle, was talking over the events of the day with his officers. He asked them who had done the best that day. Some spoke of one man who had fought very bravely, and some of another. "No," he said, "you are all mistaken. The best man in the field to-day was a soldier who was just lifting up his arm to strike an enemy, but, when he heard the trumpet sound a retreat, checked himself, dropped his arm without striking the blow. That perfect and ready obedience to the will of his general is the noblest thing that has been done to-day."

Cain rose up against Abel. He had no cause of quarrel with Abel. He need have had no jealousy, for God had told him that he would be accepted also if he did well, but Cain's heart was full of hatred and when anger is harbored there is, as God had told him, danger of crime. An old writer dwelling on the insignificance of the causes which sometimes lead to quarrels and murders, says that two brothers were walking homeward together one winter's night. Looking up at the starry sky, one of them said, "I wish I had a pasture-field as large as the sky. The other said, 'I wish I had as many sheep as there are stars.' " "Well," said the first, "they would be of no use to you, where could you feed so many?" "I would turn them into your pasture," said the second. "You would have to get my permission for that," said the first. "I should do it," said the second, "whether I had it or not." So a quarrel arose and then a fight in which one of the brothers was killed.

Am I my brother's keeper? The retort showed the malignity in the man's heart. Had he felt what we call even natural affection he would never have uttered it. An incident which occurred not long ago in Poland shows to what degree a boy regarded himself as his brother's protector. A peasant and his wife went to a neighboring village to attend a wedding. A very severe snowstorm came on, and they were unable to get back that night. They left their dwelling in the care of two little boys one about six years of age, and his brother about two years younger. It appears that about nightfall these two boys had gone out to amuse themselves in the falling snow. During the time they were playing, in some way the frost had fixed the street door so that on their return they were unable to open it and regain access to their home. They were unable to endure the severe cold, and were frozen to death. When the bodies of the little victims to the bitter night were found, it was noticed that the elder had made, in tender solicitude, every effort to save the younger. He had taken off his own shoes and put them over the feet of his little brother, leaving himself barefooted, and had tried to keep him warm by clasping him to his bosom in close embrace. All had been in vain. They both lay in the stronger embrace of death, their cheeks covered with frozen tears.

My punishment is greater than I can bear. The murderer's doom is an awful one and many have found the torture of conscience so intolerable, that they have voluntarily given themselves up to justice. The agony is vividly described in Bulwer Lytton's Eugene Aram and in Shakespeare's Macbeth. An Illinois journal gives a pathetic account of a murderer's sufferings while awaiting execution. When sentence was passed upon him and he had given up all hope of a commutation of sentence, he marked the date of execution on a calendar in his cell and every day afterward drew his pencil through another day. All the long hours of the day he paced his cell bemoaning his fate and vainly deploring the deed which had brought it upon him. He was unable to concentrate his mind on anything, but was constantly recalling the incidents of his crime, the scene and circumstances, and wishing he had not done the fatal act. The anguish the man suffered during those few weeks was infinitely more trying than the pain his victim suffered in dying.

In Beirut and Paradise.
Tude Turkish Officials—A Linguistic Babel—Walks in an Aromatic Eden.

YOU have made a Paradise here!" said the visitor to a city garden to the owner.

"Humph!" looking sourly at the dingy, ill-built cross streets, by which his home and grounds were surrounded. "But you see I have to go through the other place to get to my Paradise!"

The growl recurred to me as we climbed the stone steps leading from the boat that had brought us to the Beirut landing. The yellow walls, red roofs and, what were at that distance, hanging gardens of the town sloped upward to the brow of a hill that is not shamed by Mount Lebanon facing it across the narrowed sea. Tall palms showed above masses of olive, fig and mulberry trees and flowering vines.

At the head of the flight of stairs rocked and yelled a crowd in motley array. Had time and quiet been vouchsafed, we could have identified Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, Phrygia and Pamphylia in Egypt, strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, assuredly had their representative waves in the surf of humanity, and Cretes and Arabians were loudest of lung, most violent of gesticulation. We were upon the topmost step when a big fellow in a black gown and white cap reeled almost to the lower from a push dealt by a smaller man in custom-house livery. Before our turn came to stand in the official presence, two others were thrust from a door leading to an inner room. If there were one hundred men there, eighty-eight were vociferating in half-a-dozen different dialects, with apparently eighty-eight separate and dire grievances.

David Jamal—the impassively courteous dragoman—looked twice over his shoulder to say, "Keep close to me!" and in the lee of his broad back, we waited until he presented our passports, with a grave bow, to the aforesaid functionary. He was not a large functionary, as I have said: he was young, and nature in bestowing upon him a round face and fresh-colored cheeks, had not intended him to look fierce. He achieved a tolerable imitation of ferocity, as, jerking open the folds of the documents, and glaring from them to us, he demanded in English: "Why didn't they have them vised by the Turkish consul in America?"

We said nothing, but we were not abashed. David was running the affair; we had a serene sense of being only passengers. Had we taken part in the conversation, it would have been to ask why in the name of reason and the law of nations, we should have the papers vised by the Turkish, any more than by the English, German, French, Egyptian, Austrian, Grecian and Italian consuls. As an illustration of the Turkish principles that might makes right, and occupation signifies despotic power, our officer sat down at a table, after three minutes of heathenish raging, and executed a half-score of scratches in the corner of each passport, for which we paid six dollars and a half.

"Now, be off with you!" was the next mandate, and still in David's wake, we passed into an inner and, incredible as it would have seemed a moment ago—a noisier court, where our luggage was examined.

Men in braided jackets and red fezes, with swords at their sides, fell upon our respectable trunks, satchels and shawl-straps as tigers upon sheep, tore out books, clothing and shoes, opened boxes and portfolios, ran rude hands into the depths and under the sides of the disordered mass. A wild exclamation burst from two who had in hand a shawl-strap containing a sea-rug, and something hard and square. In a twinkling buckles were loosened, the suspicious folds undone, and Alcides' kodak lay revealed to the majesty of the Ottoman government. The wolfish gleam in eyes that beheld the smiles we did not try to repress, would have meant bastinado and bow-strings a century and a half ago.

THE CITY OF BEIRUT, SYRIA.
(From a photograph secured in the East for "The Christian Herald.")

While the examination was going on, I had retired to a bench behind a sort of counter, and, always serene in the persuasion that ours was a secondary interest in the scene, so long as our dragoman stood dignified and unbending, in the fore-front of the battle, entertained myself with watching our fellow-victims. One old Greek, with grizzled beard and travel-stained robe, had no less than six bags of divers material, all sewed up with strong twine. He actually threw himself upon them, as an officer whipped out a knife and began cutting the stitches. A second official flew to his comrade's aid and tore the lean arms from their hold. After that, they left not one stitch upon another to tell the tale. Out tumbled upon the floor what looked more like the contents of a rag-bag than any possible articles. The officers kicked them apart and over, and leaving them where they lay, turned to the wretched owner who was now blubbering like a seven-year-old baby, and dived into his pockets. From one they drew a filthy calico bag, containing what, from the shape and size, might have been marbles, and, after shaking it before his eyes, transferred it to the pocket of one of his tormentors. The old Greek sat like Marius in the middle of ruin, watering the dusty floor with his tears, when, our own belongings having been restored to the trunks and bags by David and his men, we left the screeching babel behind.

Nobody can form an approximate idea of the tumult accompanying what I have but faintly described, unless he has with his own ears taken in as much of it as the excruciated tympanum can bear. I had lain upon the lounge in my room in the Hotel d'Orient—a chamber with a ceiling fully twenty feet high, looking across the blue waters to the Lebanon range—before the horrid din ceased to vibrate upon the nerves of hearing.

Then—a card was brought to me, accompanied by a gift of fruit and flowers, and the gates of Paradise began to swing ajar. They were wide open as we drove, later in the day, to the higher part of the town where are situated the buildings of the Syrian Protestant College—that splendid monument of Christian genius and faith in those who founded and have conducted it, and of the Christian liberality of large-minded men at home. As we cleared the lower streets, vegetation became more abundant and of tropical luxuriance. The yellow stone walls on each hand were overtopped by masses of verdure; passion-flowers showed darkly-purple among the five-fingered leaves of vines running over verandas and house-fronts and along the rough walls. Intersecting lanes were lined with tall cacti, the fleshy leaves, as large as a man's hand, the stalks near the ground larger than a man's arm. Oleanders, pink and white, blossomed upon trees fifteen and twenty feet high; the regal "poinsettia," cultivated in American conservatories, spread broad disks of scarlet upon shrubs six feet in height—orange-

College, Dr. Bliss, whose name and fame are dear to all conversant with the story of Syrian missions—our wheels brushed against a hedge of rose-geranium.

Such were the external phases of our paradise on that late autumnal afternoon. Lovelier and far dearer was that unexpected welcome that awaited us from those who ceased to be strangers from the moment our hands met in greeting. This is not the place, nor is mine the province to give a statistical history of the glorious educational institution—the light-house set on a hill through which we were courteously conducted. We attended afternoon prayers in the fine chapel, the gift of another of our Christian countrymen. The services were all in Arabic, the selection of Scripture, the hymn, set to an Arabic air, and the prayer by Dr. Post, the distinguished head of the medical department of what is, to all intents and purposes, a university. The students are chiefly Syrians, many of them belonging to Moslem families, but there are Egyptians among them, and, here and there, an uncovered head bespoke Greek parentage or birth.

Then we had what our English cousins know as "a cup of afternoon tea," in the cozy parlor of the President's house. My cup was the more delicious because passed to me by a bright-faced, sweet-voiced girl—a missionary in the third generation—to whom Arabic is as familiar as English. The tea-drinking was a prelude to a Thanksgiving gathering held two evenings later in the house of Professor Porter. Reckoning backward, as befitted our eastern pilgrimage, we computed that at the very hour in which we were thinking of and praying for "home and native land," hundreds of thousands of happy families were discussing Thanksgiving dinners. A sweet savor of turkey and pumpkin pies floated into the imagination, and as we sang, with a will, "My Country, 'tis of Thee," we could almost catch the echoes left in the welkin by the millions of voices that had shouted it that day.

We had much and delightful social communion when the more formal exercises of the evening were over. To us, the newly arrived, the cordial hospitality then and there received, the pleasant ring of American voices, the genial warmth of inquiries as to our plans, and offers of co-operation in our work, are among the things one dare not trust oneself to commit to paper.

As I write, the sunset is bathing the Lebanon Mountains with pink. The Lebanon, where Hiram's men relieved Solomon's in regular turn in lifting axes upon thick trees. The floats which were to convey the felled cedars to Jaffa were moored over there in the bay. The wash of the waves mingles with the tinkle of the donkey-bells from the street below, that reminds one oddly of sleighing season.

Circumstances have compelled us to tarry for a few days in this land of Beulah. The sea lies behind us, the hills and desert are before us, and the breathing spell is welcome. Such wealth of kindness, such Christianly-affectionate treatment as has been ours from the hour we cleared the purgatory of the lower town, add sensibly to one's wealth of heart and memory. The recollection will sound through the years to come like the soothing murmur of the Mediterranean upon the Beirut beach; lie upon "mountain-ranges overpast" of experience, as the sunset flush upon Lebanon.

"Everything is ready for to-morrow, David?" as the magnetic figure bows in the doorway.

"Everything, madame; my men, implements and animals."

"To-morrow, then, begins our real work?"

David bows again, his hand on his head. "Not of myself, madame, but with God's help, I hope to see you safely to your journey's end!"

DEAD BEATS.

THERE is a large class of people in our communities who live upon others.

They have hands and feet and brain, with which to achieve their own livelihood, but they prefer to depend upon the result of the industry of others. There are, as near as I can tell, in this country to-day, about a hundred thousand of what are commonly called "dead beats." It seems to me that it is high time that we men and women, who in our occupations and professions are toiling until we cannot draw another ounce, ceased being taxed to support the lazy scoundrels of America. For the sick and decrepit and the helpless, we must lend our shoulder, but for this wandering vagabondism, for these leeches put on the arm of honest industry until they suck the blood, for these vermin crawling through society, crawling through prisons, crawling through court-rooms, crawling through churches, crawling through lecture-halls, let there be nothing but extirpation. The most of these men who are living on others could find occupation if they were not too proud or too lazy to take certain kinds of occupation. In Philadelphia a man who had a family of ten children came to me and wanted to borrow fifteen dollars. I said to him, "I will not loan you fifteen dollars, but I will give you fifteen dollars provided you will open a news-stand and support yourself. I know just where I can get a position for you on the street for your news-stand, and I will give you the fifteen dollars if you will promise to expend it in the starting of that business." He said he would take until the next day to think about it. On the morrow he came to me and thanked me for my kindness, but said that he had concluded that it would not be a business worthy of him! "Well," I said, "how please don't bother me any more, for I have work. Good-morning!" Many of that kind of people live on their wits. They try to see what they can pick up. They hover around the headquarters of political parties just before elections, and hurrah for the men that they think will be elected. They are hearty Republicans or rousing Democrats, according as it pays. For months after we inaugurate a new President, Washington City is full of them. All the trees around the White House were filled with these crows when Garfield was shot. That shot frightened them off their roosts, but every winter they are back again as thick as ever.

The vast majority of them, of course, get disappointed and are mad enough to shoot anything, from a President down to a sapling. The curse of this country is the geniuses—those men who think themselves Lord Byrons, not because of any of his talent, but because they have his vices and his big shirt-collar. The only kind of genius that is worth anything is the genius for hard, practical, useful work. If God has given you two hands and two feet and good health, you have magnificent equipment. Those who were born at the top of the ladder do not have much chance, but those who are born at the foot of the ladder have the better chance. George Peabody endowed a library in the village where he once had sawed wood. The shoemaker's last would have been the most appropriate coat-of-arms for William Cary, the missionary, and Sir Cloudesly Shovel, the admiral and famous author. The butcher's stall was the starting-place for Kirke White and Akenside and Cardinal Wolsey. Herschel played in a brass band before God called him up to listen to the music of the spheres and the orchestra of the morning stars. A barber-shop was the starting-place for Copernicus, the astronomer, and Arkwright, the inventor, and Jeremy Taylor, the ecclesiast, and Tenterden, the Lord Chief Justice of England. A mason's trowel was the weapon with which the learned Ben Jonson, and Hugh Miller, the geologist, began to fight the battle of life. With a weaver's shuttle, Columbus, the discoverer, and Dr. Livingstone, the explorer, and John Foster, the essayist, and Wilson, the ornithologist, began to weave their fortunes and their usefulness. Out of every hard position in life there are fifty doors, which, at the tap of the hard knuckle of toil, swing wide open. Do not join the great army of able-bodied beggars and dead-beats. When the time comes that you feel like putting your lazy hands on your hips, and saying, "The world owes me a living," it owes you a halter.

BLESS THE DOCTORS!

COMMUNITIES do not realize the hardships endured, the self-sacrifices made and the wonders wrought by the medical profession. I wish that someone would rise, competent to tell of the martyrs of the scalpel, the martyrs of the sick-room and the martyrs of the epidemic. When I was in California, I was told by a gentleman who had just returned from the Sandwich Islands, the following incident: You may know that one of the Sandwich Islands is given up to lepers. When a man becomes a leper he is sent there to die. He may not leave the island. In some the disease is further advanced than in others, but all the inhabitants, sooner or later, expire of the leprosy. A physician in one of the healthy islands was noticed always to have his glove on. For a long while it had been noticed. One day he came to the public authorities and pulled off his glove and showed a small spot of leprosy on his hand. He said: "You see, I am doomed to die. I might hide this a good while and keep off the Isle of Lepers, but as I am a physician, I choose to go now and be of service to those who are further on in the disease. It would be selfish for me to stay here amid luxurious surroundings, when I might soothe and help the wretched." He bade farewell to family and friends. The parting was most agonizing. He could never see one of their faces again. He was transported to the Isle of Lepers and wrought among the sick until prostrated for his own death, which finally came. That was sacrifice, radiant and magnificent, surpassed by none, save that of him who exiled himself from the health of heaven to the leprous isle of this earth that he might physician our wounds, and weep our griefs, and die our deaths, and turn this isle of a leprous world into one great, blooming paradise of God.

But the world is full of incidents of endurance on the part of doctors. I stood one summer in Edinburgh, Scotland, in the room where Dr. James Y. Simpson made the experiments which resulted in the discovery of chloroform as an anæsthetic, blessed by many a battlefield and by all the operating rooms of medical institutions. A member of the family said: "Here is where Sir James sat, and in those chairs were his fellow-experimenters, all physicians." They inhaled the powerful agent again and again, until they all went into insensibility. When Sir James woke from one of these stupors, he found some of the doctors on the floor and some chattering like idiots and all temporarily disabled. His fellow-experimenters became discouraged and quitted these awful interviews, but Sir James went right on toward one of the sublimest forces with which to fight physical pain.

The medical profession has again and again stood between us and Asiatic cholera and yellow fever. They have been successful advocates of ventilation, sewerage, drainage and fumigation. I rejoice that the poorest classes get advantage of high medical skill. No excuse now for any man not having scientific attendance. Dispensaries and infirmaries everywhere, under the control of the best doctors, some of them poorly paid, some of them not paid at all. In one dispensary in one year, one hundred and fifty thousand prescriptions were issued. The physicians in this country do more missionary work without charge than all the other professionals put together.

There are many who blame the doctor because the people die, forgetting the divine enactment: "It is appointed unto all men once to die." The father of medicine, who announced the fact that he had discovered an art by which to make men in this world immortal, himself died at 47 years of age, showing that immortality was less than half a century for him.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Owing to the widespread suffering among the poor, this season, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in frequent receipt of letters from very needy persons in different parts of the country, appealing for help. These applications are so numerous as to be altogether beyond our capacity for extending relief. Among our readers there are doubtless many benevolent people who would be pleased to be put in communication with some really deserving poor one. If any of our readers so charitably disposed, would send us their names and addresses for this special purpose, we will send to each, one letter a year and no more, from some needy person who has appealed for aid. All letters relating to business of this nature should be addressed to "The Relief Box," CHRISTIAN HERALD Office.

Anxious One, Miss. Is it wrong for a person to do deeds of charity, unknown to anyone, and then deny it when asked about it?

To deny it would be to lie, and a lie is never justifiable. A simple refusal to speak on the subject, would be the better plan for one who did not wish his charities known.

S. H. Brokaw, Hornellsville, N. Y. What were the respective ages of Jesus Christ, John and Paul when they died?

No information on the subject is given in the New Testament. Tradition is often unreliable, but we give it for what it is worth. It is that Christ was thirty-three years and three months old when he was crucified, and this is to some extent confirmed by Luke 3: 23. Paul is said to have been sixty-four years old when he was beheaded. The date of John's death is uncertain. He outlived all the Apostles, and the early Christian writers speak of him as an extremely venerable man. By some he is believed to have died at the age of eighty-four, while others think that he lived to be a hundred and sixteen years old.

John E. Anderson, West Boylston, Mass. Why does Solomon give in Prov. 26: 4, 5, two contradictory injunctions about the method of treating fools?

The first injunction is a caution against light and frivolous conversation; the second is a direction as to method of argument. The most effective way of convincing a man of the unsoundness of his reasoning often is to show him where it leads to. This method is called the "reductio ad absurdum." An illustration of it was given in a famous discussion in which one of the disputants raised his argument on the combination of two isolated passages of Scripture. His opponent said that any absurdity might be proved in the same way and as an instance mentioned the combination, "Judas went out and hanged himself" (Matt. 27: 5), and "Go and do thou likewise" (Luke 10: 37).

Frank E. Guy, Oberlin, Kan. 1. How many women went to the sepulchre on the Resurrection morn? 2. How many times did our Saviour appear, from his resurrection, up to and including the ascension?

1. Mary Magdalene, Mary, the mother of James, and Salome, are especially mentioned in Mark 16. Matthew mentions only two by name, while John only names Mary Magdalene. Luke, however, intimates that there may have been a larger number, as he says "certain others" came with them. (See Luke 24.) The number cannot be definitely stated, but there were apparently three at least and probably more. 2. Ten times, viz: To Mary Magdalene (John 20: 11-17 and Mark 16: 9), to the "other women" (Matt. 28: 9-10), to two disciples on the way to Emmaus (Mark 16: 12-13; Luke 24: 13-35), to Cephas (1. Cor. 15: 5), to all the apostles, except Thomas (Mark 16: 14; Luke 24: 36-49; John 20: 19-25; 1. Cor. 15: 5), to all the apostles at Jerusalem (John 20: 26-29), to seven apostles at the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 28: 16; John 21: 1-23) to above 500 on a mountain in Galilee, (Matt. 28: 16-20; Mark 16: 15-18; 1. Cor. 15: 6), to James "the Less" and then to all the twelve (Acts 1: 3-8; 1. Cor. 15: 7), at the Ascension (Mark 16: 19, 20; Luke 24: 50-53 Acts 1: 9-12).

W. P. Roberts, Stateford, Pa. Was the Lord's prayer (Matt. 6: 9-13) in the Temple service before Christ taught it to his disciples?

Parallel expressions to those in the prayer are found at different places in the Talmud, but Christ was probably the first to group them together in that form and in his own words. It is not likely that any such prayer was used in the Temple service.

Reader, Litchfield, Mich. In what respect does the High Church, or Ritualistic party, in the Protestant Church, differ from the Roman Catholic Church?

The chief difference, we believe, is that the Ritualists do not acknowledge the authority of the Pope, whom they call the Bishop of Rome. There are, however, many grades in the party. Some do not worship the Virgin Mary or practice auricular confession. Probably all the consistent members of the party abstain from meat on Fridays and fast-days.

T. Given. Will you please tell me the meaning of the word "I. N. R. I.?" I have not been able to find it in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, nor in any other book in my possession.

The four letters "I. N. R. I." compose the initials of the Latin inscription on the crown of Christ, signifying "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." The inscription was written in three languages: Latin, Greek and Aramaic—the latter being the common tongue of the people of Palestine, the Latin that of the Romans, and the Greek that of the foreign element.

E. Gemmell, Roanoke, Va. What is the time occupied in the journey between Alexandria and Cairo, Egypt, and also between Cairo and Jerusalem, by the usual way of travel?

The usual route is: Alexandria to Cairo about four hours. At Cairo the traveler stops over night, and then proceeds by steamer to Ismailia, on the Suez Canal, a 3 hours' journey. Next from Ismailia to Port Said (about 5 hours), Port Said to Jaffa (one night by sea), and Jaffa to Jerusalem (about 3½ hours by rail). Formerly the trip from Jaffa to the Holy City occupied 14 hours, but the old method of traveling by horses and camels is now in disuse.

F. B., New York. 1. When did Christ become conscious that he was the Son of God? 2. Does Mark 13: 32 imply that the Father could know something of which the Son was ignorant? 3. To whom does Isaiah refer 9: 6? I thought he referred to Christ, but am told that the best scholars think he did not?

1. Probably the full consciousness did not come to him till the period of his temptation in the wilderness. He evidently had some idea of his supernatural commission and his relation to the Father, when he made his answer at twelve years old to his parents (Luke 2: 49), and this would be confirmed at his baptism by the voice from heaven (Luke 3: 22). It may have been a gradual revelation. 2. It not only implies it, but states it positively, and it is in a line with John 14: 28, where Christ explicitly declares, "My Father is greater than I." The mystery of the Trinity is one that can never be completely understood on this side the grave. 3. Isaiah may have consciously referred to an expected deliverer or reformer, such as King Josiah, but the words were doubtless intended of God as a prophecy of Christ. Peter said 1 Peter 1: 10-12 that the prophets were often unaware of the full significance and meaning of the words they wrote.

Sing Sing, N. Y. The prisoners who have received religious papers through your kindness are sincerely grateful to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and to the friends who have responded to its call. How many good Christians there are in the world! We would like to thank each donor separately, but that seems impossible. God has noticed their gifts and the prayers which accompanied them. The papers surely are a blessing. I wish all the friends who sent them could have seen the eagerness with which the prisoners received them. But we need more. There are about fourteen hundred prisoners. We had about 600 papers for them. That is a large number of papers, but we wish we had more. A. E. V.

M. T. Gale, Worcester, Mass. A city missionary found a quiet and self-respecting woman, who had been without food three days. When her case became known, food and even luxuries were sent in abundance. A rich lady went herself with restoratives, and did everything possible for the poor sufferer's comfort, but she was too reduced to fully recover. This was not officially reported as a case of starvation, but this woman actually died of hunger. The need seems to be of a multitude more of city missionaries to search every garret and cellar. These missionaries learn to love their work, as do all who comfort the suffering. We have known those to whom it has become a passion to relieve distress, regardless of self. What are $10,000 or $20,000 a year to one who has millions? Will not these rich men each select a locality in New York and supply it with relief workers and thus make sure that there is no starvation in that district?

THE ANARCHIST'S BOMB.

THE European mails supplement the reports previously received by cable of the Anarchist outrage in Paris, a picture of which appears on this page. It appears that on December 9, during the sitting of the French Chamber of Deputies which corresponds with our House of Representatives, a loud explosion shook the building. It proceeded from a bomb thrown from the upper gallery which is open to the public. It was constructed to explode on striking any obstacle, and the man who threw it intended that it should reach the floor before exploding. But it struck on the edge of the lower gallery and exploded in mid-air. To this accident many deputies owe their lives. Only four of them were seriously hurt; but in the lower gallery, in front of which the bomb exploded, sixty-five persons were severely injured. A policeman, on duty there, had two of his fingers carried away by a fragment of the bomb. A state of panic followed the explosion. The deputies, not knowing how many more bombs might be thrown, began leaving the Chamber precipitately, but M. Dupuy, the President, stopped the panic by a few brave words. "Silence gentlemen," he said, "It cannot be for our dignity that such attempts should be able to disturb our deliberations. The sitting continues. The next speaker is M. de Montfort." M. Dupuy's wonderful calmness quieted his audience and almost before the dust and smoke from the bomb had dispersed, the Chamber was listening quietly to the debate. The rush from the galleries had been wilder than on the floor, but the military guard closed all doors and would allow no one to pass except those who could be identified. The man who threw the bomb was soon detected. A woman who sat near him, saw him throw it and tried to prevent his doing so. He bitterly complained that she had spoiled his aim, otherwise the bomb would have exploded by the President's table and killed him and the most distinguished deputies, who sit near him. He proved to be a man named Vaillant, a notorious anarchist well-known to the police. He gloried in his crime and lamented that he had not succeeded in killing the President of the Chamber and his colleagues. He had led an idle, dissolute life from boyhood and has often been in prison. His crime is leading the government to take active measures against the anarchists and it is wisely including with the crazy, miserable creatures who perpetrate the foul murderous deeds, the writers and speakers whose wild and lying words incite them to outrage. These latter protest that they mean no harm, but the government rightly holds them responsible, for as Solomon said long ago, the man who deceiveth his neighbor and saith, Am not I in sport? is as bad as "the madman who casteth fire-brands, arrows and death." (Prov. 26: 18, 19.)

Died in Saving his Money.

The death of an eccentric recluse, who lived near Tuxedo Park, N. Y., is reported. The man was the general help of the village. He had no regular occupation, but was willing to work for any one who would employ him and he was generally engaged by some one of the farmers in the neighborhood. He had built himself a humble dwelling in which he lived alone, doing his own cooking and washing. He discouraged visitors and was a silent, moody man. He was extremely frugal and was reported to have saved a considerable sum of money which he kept hidden in his shanty. It was his habit to burn an oil-lamp all night and one night recently he accidentally upset it. In a moment the dwelling was in flames. He ran out shouting loudly for help. The neighbors came to his assistance, but were unable to subdue the fire. In the midst of the excitement, the man realized that the savings of his life were in the burning house. With an agonized cry of "My money! my money!" he darted into the house before his intention was perceived by the neighbors. Nothing more was seen of him until after the fire had burned itself out. Then his charred body was found near the door. He had found his money and was carrying it out of the house when the smoke and flames overcame him and he fell to rise no more. There are many who would call the man a fool for thinking more of his money than of his life, who are more foolish than he, for they think more of making money than they do of saving their souls. (Matt. 16: 26.)

Rescued by a Horse.

A farmer at Elk Run, Pa., lost a horse a few days ago to which he was much attached. About a year ago the neighborhood was haunted by two bears and some young the pasture where it was, found it lying dead with a ragged hole in its throat, evidently having been killed by a bear. The farmer must have often reproached himself for his intention to kill the poor beast that was capable of rendering him so valuable a service in his dire need. But men often despise those who can and would do them the best services. In the greatest of all the world's tragedies, the Divine Victim pleaded for his murderers because they knew not what they did. (Luke 23: 34.)

The Most Powerful Light in the World.

By the recent appropriation of ten thousand dollars the Government will equip the light-house at Fire Island with the most powerful light in the world. It will be two hundred and forty million candle power, which is nearly double the power of the one at Havre France, which at present is the strongest in existence. The electric light plant is already being put in and will soon be in operation. A lens nine feet in diameter has been purchased, which will throw the rays twenty-four miles in a straight line out to sea. It will be a flash light, the flashes lasting one second with intervals of five seconds. A new discovery which will be applied to this light will increase its usefulness. The light will be directed to the sky, which will carry it by reflection much farther, and it is believed that incoming vessels will be able to see and recognize it a hundred miles away. This far-reaching light may prove a welcome guide to mariners by its timely warning.

THE ANARCHIST'S BOMB EXPLODING IN THE FRENCH LEGISLATIVE CHAMBER

cubs. The common way in that district to get rid of such unwelcome visitors is to put a dead horse at the end of a narrow road on which a bear trap is placed. The carcass of the horse attracts the bear, who hurrying along the path to get at it, falls into the trap. The farmer had a horse which had been in his service for twenty years and was unable to do farm work. He decided to kill it and use it as bait for the bears. Accordingly, he loaded it with a bear trap and set out with his rifle to the place he had chosen for the operation. On his way he saw two bear cubs asleep at the foot of a tree. He shot them both and was examining the carcasses, when a she-bear emerged from the bushes and seeing her dead cubs rushed furiously at their slayer. She knocked him down and in falling his rifle fell beyond his reach. He believes that in a few minutes he would have been killed, had not his old horse interfered. A vigorous kick from its hoofs on the side of the bear diverted the brute's attention from the man to the horse. The farmer sprang to his feet, seized his rifle and shot the bear dead. He couldn't turn the horse into bait for a bear-trap after such a service, and he showed his gratitude by relieving it of work and giving it comfortable quarters and an abundance of good food. It lived until a few days ago, when the farmer going to

The voyagers on life's ocean often need such guidance, but the converse of this principle applies in their case. They are helped not by human light reflected from the heavens, but by heavenly light reflected by men whom God has enlightened. Phil. 2: 15.

Curious Psychological Experiments.

A series of interesting experiments are being made at Yale College by Professors Scripture, Ladd and Anderson with the object of testing a new theory. The subjects of the experiments are some of the most celebrated swordsmen in the country. With exceedingly delicate instruments, the professors are trying to determine by fencing tests the exact time required by the brain and nerves to decide on and produce action. It is obvious that even in fencing when the movements must necessarily be rapid there must be intervals, infinitesimal in duration, between the mind perceiving that a certain action has taken place, the choice of method of meeting the new situation, and the action chosen. The experiments are being made to test the theory that what is known as muscular strength does not depend upon the size of the muscle, but upon the strength of the nerve centre and the quality of the muscle. The test, it is believed, will show that a man mentally fatigued is not as strong physically as when his mind is not tired. If this is established, all the old theories of muscular strength will become obsolete. The experiments will also have a religious bearing. If physical strength so largely depends on mental power we have a new application of the Scriptural statement that as a man thinketh in his heart so is he (Prov. 23: 7) and can understand on scientific grounds how it is that they who wait on the Lord renew their strength. Isa. 40: 31.)

BRIEF NOTES.

During a recent revival in Formosa more than 500 people banished idols from their homes, and a heathen temple was converted into a house of worship, dedicated to the true God.

Evangelist Arthur Crane who has been laboring successfully at Plainfield, N. J., is announced to commence a series of Bible Readings for young men at Montclair, N. J., early next month.

A personal letter from Madame Tel Sono contains the news of her safe arrival in her native land. Already she has made several addresses to meetings of old acquaintances and has been well received. Several persons have expressed a desire to hear more of the "Jesus doctrine."

The late David Ingalls, of Springville, N. Y., left an estate valued at about $800,000, the bulk of which was bequeathed to charities. The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church receives $200,000, and the Board of Foreign Missions $150,000.

The Catalogue of the Reformed Church Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., for 1893-1894, shows that there are enrolled thirty-nine students, the senior and junior classes having each fourteen, and the middle class eleven. Of this number, twenty-five entered from Rutgers College, N. J., and two from Hope College, Mich.

We regret to learn that the international Society of Christian Workers has sustained a loss. Its offices in the Blair Building, New Haven, Conn., were destroyed by fire on Dec. 15. The copies and plates of the reports of the annual Conventions were completely spoiled, as were a large supply of tracts and other property of the Society.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Spencer Walton, whose portraits appeared in this journal on Dec. 20th, have been conducting union Missionary meetings at Toronto and Ottawa. Their story of the work of the Cape General Mission in South Africa has aroused a deep interest in the field which should issue in such an accession of funds as will enable the Mission to open its new stations.

The Presbyterian Church has decided to build a large central mission house in New York. The late Mrs. Robert L. Stuart bequeathed to the Church a million dollars to be used in some permanent investment. Although leaving the Church free to choose the form of the investment, she expressed the preference for the erection of a home for the Presbyterian Boards of Home and Foreign Missions, etc. The site is on the northwest corner of Fifth Ave. and Twentieth St. The building will be eleven stories high and cost $1,000,000.

The International Sunday School Lesson Committee, of which Rev. Warren Randolph of Newport, R. I., is secretary, has issued a circular letter inviting "the counsel, co-operation, and prayers" of the Sunday School world for the furtherance of the important work committed to its charge. Letters may be sent to Mr. Randolph. The lessons for 1895 have already been arranged.

The mission to Deep Sea Fishermen on the coast of Labrador, which was sent out from St. Johns, Newfoundland, has accomplished excellent service during the past summer. The ship that was sent carried three mission doctors. These treated 2,250 patients and erected two hospitals, which have been very serviceable. It is hoped that the steamer may be sent again next year.

Rev. John W. Chapman, the Protestant Episcopal missionary, of Anvik, Alaska, who is now in New York on a vacation, made it known sometime ago that there was need of a medical missionary in his sphere. Miss Mary B. Gienton, a trained nurse, promptly entered herself as a student at the Woman's Medical College of Chicago, that she might undertake the work. She has received her diploma, and will soon start for her lonely station.

A number of destitute families in New York have been set to work by the East Side Relief Committee. The men are chiefly tailors and other workers of the needle who are out of employment. All the clothing manufactured is sent to Miss Clara Barton for the Sea Island sufferers. A large box will be forwarded soon. As the garments are given away, a double benefit is derived from the gifts. Starving families in New York are fed, and destitute people in the South are clothed.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CERTAIN COMFORT.

Text: Eccles. 8: 12, "Surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God who fear before him."

WE have just crossed the boundary line between the old year and the new. We would be more or less than human did not solemn thoughts fill our minds to-day. Longfellow, in his "Evangeline," speaks of the strange fears of coming ill, which at times we all feel, and adds:

"As, at the tramp of a horse's hoof on the turf of the prairies, Far in advance are closed the leaves of the shrinking mimosa,
So, at the hoof-beats of fate, with sad forebodings of evil, Shrinks and closes the heart, ere the stroke of doom has attained it."

Perhaps our hearts tremble as we begin the new year and listen for the hoof-beats of God's possible providences before the year shall close. What messengers shall come? Shall some dark shadow fall over home or heart? Who can tell? Thank God, no one can tell. We go out into the opening year trusting in his divine care and almighty love.

It has been for some time our custom to give on the first Sunday morning of the new year a passage of Scripture which may serve as

A Motto-text for the Year.

I hear that these new-year texts, because of the emphasis which the occasion gives them, have been a "vade mecum" to many; and that they have made joy more joyous, and sorrow less grievous. Some of our number who are absent from us send for them regularly, and are much helped by them during the year; and some have them, as the result of various artistic devices, always before their eyes in their homes. Their selection has come, therefore, to be a matter of careful thought and earnest prayer. The passage chosen for this year is this: "Surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him."

In the former part of this verse the character and condition of sinners are contrasted with those of the righteous. However long the sinner lives in sin, and however prosperous he may seem to be, yet it shall be ill with him; but however it may seem sometimes to be with the righteous man, in the long run it shall be well with him. It will readily be admitted by all that Solomon was a competent witness. He had tasted the so-called sweetness of sin in all its forms, he had partaken of its various cups even to satiety. Repeatedly has he given us the deliberate results of his wide and varied experiences. His words ought to have great weight. This text is well calculated to check the folly and presumption of the sinner, and to comfort the righteous man in the trials of life; and especially in the apparent delay of justice in the triumphs of the ungodly.

The Persons Described.

Notice, in the first place, the persons who are here described—"them that fear God." This is in the Word of God a common designation of the people of God. The fear of the Lord is emphasized as the beginning of wisdom. What is meant by this fear? What kind of fear is it? It is certainly not servile fear. It may have something of that character in its beginning; but it does not long continue in that atmosphere. Experience proves that many a Christian begins his Christian life with the fear of God in its lowest sense, the fear of punishment, as its inspiring motive. Better that than a life of indifference to truth and God. The Bible does appeal to that element; we are taught to fear him who can destroy both soul and body in hell. The heart has many doors; over one is written Faith, over another Hope, over another Love. The Word of God knocks at each of these doors. In the case of one man the heart is entered by one door; in the case of another man by another door. The man who is learning a new language, or learning to speak his own correctly, speaks for a time laboriously under the fear of violating some grammatical rule; but after a time the knowledge of the language becomes a part of his very nature, and he rises above the fear of violating the rules of grammar and comes into the love of correct speech. So, starting in the Christian life on the low plane of fear in its lower senses, we may rise into the perfect love of God which casteth out all fear; we learn to love truth, to love holiness and to love God for their own sake; we would serve God if there were no hell to be shunned and no heaven to be won; and we come finally to think little of either as motives in life and work, for then the love of Christ constraineth us. At this stage in our Christian lives we fear simply lest we may offend God, our Father, Friend and Redeemer.

Filial Fear.

This latter fear is truly filial; it is the fear of a son and not that of a slave. Christians are the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. They have received the adoption of sons; they cry, Abba, Father. There is a holy, humble, fiducial fear; it is a loving confidence; it is an affectionate trust. When a man is adopted into God's family and is living in full and blessed consciousness of that adoption, he will serve God because of the joy of that service. He is then a new man; he is influenced by new motives; he is under the control of the constraining love of Christ. It is a false humility which leads a man to call himself a slave when God calls him a son. The Prodigal Son expected to say on his return: "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before Thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants;" but when his father's kiss was on his cheek and the sense of forgiving love in his heart, all the words which he had conned over were not uttered. He says, indeed: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son," but here he stops. The Father's voice is instantly heard saying: "Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him." Filial love is now filling his soul. When Louis the Fourteenth would test the courtesy of Lord Chesterfield—or, according to some authorities, the Earl of Stair—he had his carriage door opened and asked the nobleman to step in first, and he immediately stepped in, leaving the king to follow. Louis complimented him for having maintained his reputation for gentlemanliness, and his reply was, "I hope I am too much of a gentleman to refuse the request of a king." We ought to be too humble to refuse the request of the King of Heaven. True humility takes the place which God gives; to refuse is not true humility but culpable unbelief.

It is genuine, sincere, honest and hearty fear which God's people possess. This characteristic of their fear is taught us by the latter part of the verse which says, "which fear before him." This description suggests the transparent, the godly fear which is here commended. It is far removed from the fear of the hypocrite. This true fear comes from the bottom of the soul. It is genuine even in the presence of the omnipresent and omniscient God. This is the only religion which endures the test; it will bear the scrutiny of men and angels, and will receive at last the approval of God.

The Promise Given.

Observe, in the second place, the promise concerning the people of God: "It shall be well with them." This is a modest, and we may say, inadequate putting of this great certainty. Much more is implied than is expressed. Often this is the strongest way of stating a great truth; conscious of its greatness, the speaker designedly expresses it only partially. Neither saint nor seraph can tell all that is included in this "well." Ask

Enoch; ask Paul. What shall they answer? Only this: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

It is not said that believers shall not have their share in the ordinary trials of life. The Bible nowhere promises us exemption from these trials. It does not assure us that we shall not go into the furnace, nor into the deep waters; but it does promise that the fire shall not consume us and that the waters shall not overflow us. In the midst of the trial it shall still be well with us. By our side in the furnace there shall be One who is like the Son of God, and we shall come out without even the smell of fire on our garments. It is not said that Christians shall not have extraordinary trials. Christianity develops manhood; it vastly enlarges the sphere of life. It gives a broader surface across which the winds of adversity may sweep. It gives greater possibilities of enjoyment; and these make greater trials certain. A Christian man is higher, and deeper, and broader than other men are. He is more fully developed in all his capacities both for joy and sorrow.

Christ Suffered

unspeakably more than any other man who ever lived could suffer. He had in himself all the nobleness of man and all the gentleness of woman; he had vaster capacities of suffering than other men possess. Stoical indifference to pain is an evidence of a coarse and brutal nature. To feel, and yet to do and dare, is to be truly noble. Intellectual attainment and spiritual culture increase the number and exquisiteness of our faculties and capacities. The more our natures are developed the greater also will be our responsibilities. Loyalty to God put Joseph into prison; made Elijah face cruel Ahab and wicked Jezebel; drove Daniel into a den of lions; hurled the three faithful Hebrews into the seven-times-heated furnace; put Peter into the common prison and Paul and Silas into the inner prison and made their feet fast in the stocks. But it was still well with them. This fact is the glory of our faith; this is the joy of our life in God. Joseph finds his prison the vestibule to the palace of the Pharos; Elijah's fiery mission is but the prelude to the chariot of fire and glorious translation. From Bunyan's prison goes forth his Pilgrim to carry his name and his Lord's to the ends of the earth; from Luther's castle-prison goes forth the German Bible, the bulwark of the German nation, and of Protestantism throughout the world. It is not said that believers shall not often be in an evil case. This condition is inevitable. They shall at times seem to be utterly overthrown; but they shall still triumph in God. Quaintly has it been said that all "God's people are like birds; they sing best in cages." Out of their deepest sorrows come their sweetest songs; when most bruised they send forth the most fragrant odors. From her bed of excruciating pain Anne Steele sent out her hymns of faith, hope, and love. But for her sorrow the Church had not been cheered by her noble hymn beginning, "Father! whatever of earthly bliss." God's people know that all things work together for good to those who love him. They know that no form of trial, that neither death nor life shall be able to separate them from the love of God which is in Christ. Looking up to God in deepest grief they can say:

If from thy ordeal's heated bars
Our feet are seamed with crimson scars,
Thy will be done!

Assured Knowledge.

Notice, in the third place, the absolute certainty expressed: "Yet surely I know." There is power in absolute certainty. There are those who magnify and multiply their doubts. To doubt, they think, is an evidence of unusual intellectual acumen; it is rather a proof of mental feebleness. Doubt is the gray dawn of the morning; faith is the noonday sun. Doubt is childhood; faith is manhood, manhood in its prime and glory. Paul rang out his "I know." The blind man who had been cured triumphantly said, "I know." The Apostle John confidently repeats, "We know." To-day, there are disciples of certain schools who can only say, "perhaps," "possibly," "peradventure." These men are agnostics; that is, know-nothings. No man ought to preach his doubts; audiences have enough of their own. If some of us were to preach all that we do not know we would have an endless theme. If we have doubts, let us tell them to God; if we have truths, let us tell them to men. Thank God for men and women who are know-somethings! In the midst of earthly loss and pain they can say, "We know it shall be well."

The inspired preacher had good grounds for his knowledge. Because of God's character men may be sure that it will be well with those who fear him. God must be right. One wrong on God's part and he would no longer be God. One wrong act would overturn his throne; a God who can sin is no God. If God could sin there would be a world without a God, and a kingdom without a throne. His highest claim to our homage is his infinite rightness.

More power on God's part could not compel homage on our part. God, by his power, might crush me, but cannot compel my love; but when he shows me a Father's love, how can I, except I be an utter ingrate, withhold him a son's gratitude? "Worship God," said the angel to the overawed Apostle John. Why? The completest answer is, because God is infinitely the best Being in the universe. If you can find a better being than God, worship that other being. The history of God's people emphasizes also the truth that it is well with them that fear God. The experience of each believer proves it for himself. Do you fear God? If not, begin to day. If you do fear him, rest sweetly on his great and precious promise.

Let us, like Enoch, walk with God through the months and days of this new year. And to walk with God we must go in the same direction; two cannot walk together except they be agreed. Enoch walked and walked with God till they reached the limits of time and earth; and still kept on walking with him; walked into eternity, into heaven; walks with him still. Some who begin the year with us will end it with God. God alone knows what of trial this year has in store for each of us. But above all the sounds of life's trials shall be our note of triumph in God who will bring us off more than conquerors; and in eternity the sweetest strain of our immortal song shall be, "He hath done all things well."

A MISSIONARY CHAMPION.

Writing from Upper Burmah to the Baptist "Missionary Magazine," Rev. W. H. Roberts describes an effort which he had just been making to protect a member of his flock from undeserved punishment. It may be hoped that this effort, which was to a large extent successful, may lead the natives who know of it to credit the disinterested motives of the missionaries. Mr. Roberts says: A man who has been a member of our congregation for sixteen months and is not over twenty years of age, was arrested upon his own confession, because he accompanied some dacoits [brigands] in an attack on a village some two years ago. He took no part in the outrage, but he was made to watch the belongings of the men who did. He was tried without my knowledge and condemned to be hung. As soon as I heard I went at once to see the commissioner of the Northern Division who had passed the sentence. He received me very kindly but declined to argue the case with me, saying that he had sentenced the man and I would have to appeal to the judicial commissioner-judge of the high court. I asked if I could have the evidence upon which he was convicted, and he said I could provided I would pay the usual court fees for a copy. With $250 a year income I did not feel that I had much to spare on court fees, but when duty points the way I never stop on account of rupees. Confident that the man was as innocent as nine-tenths of his countrymen, and as ignorant of the law under which he was sentenced as the monkeys of his native jungle, I said, "Have it copied and send it as soon as possible." I had to pay five rupees [about $1.80] for the copy.

Next day in court the poor fellow's wife came with two rupees, saying, "This is all we have, but use it and save him if you can." I had never done such a thing before, but I examined the evidence produced and showed the high court that the prisoner was forced, under penalty of death, to accompany the men; and hence, while violating the letter of the law, he should not be held accountable to the extent of suffering the extreme penalty. The deputy commissioner thought I was wild to attempt to overthrow the action of the district judge; but sure of my facts and confident that the man was innocent, I wrote, not for my life but his. I at the same time petitioned the chief commissioner. The appeal was considered by the high court and the sentence changed to seven years' imprisonment. The deputy commissioner has kindly offered to do what he can to help me have this reduced.

The Gospel in the Prisons.

The Record of an Evangelistic Visit to the Penal Institutions of Canada.

BY CHARLES COOK.

To find oneself wandering through the gloomy corridors of a prison, and to hear the sorrowful tales of those who are suffering for their wrong-doing, just after you have gazed upon the majestic grandeur of Niagara, and heard the deep music of the Falls, is a contrast so great that you are led to think of the lines of Bishop Heber's hymn:

Every prospect pleases
And only man is vile.

Visiting Hamilton, Ont., recently, with the governor of the jail as guide, I called at the prison. Here were many victims of intemperance; one man has passed through this place 230 times. Another prisoner said to me, "I am glad I was sent here, for I had no power to abstain from drink outside, while I could get it; and now I hope to be able to do so."

"What will mother say?" was the exclamation of a murderer who, when sober, awoke to the fact that, when drunk, he had taken the life of his fellow. There appeared to be more liberty accorded to the prisoners here than in England, religious papers being permitted, while a photograph or two of loved friends adorned some of the cells; these certainly could only have a good effect upon the inmates.

Next I visited the Penitentiary or convict station of Ontario, at Kingston. There, under the care of Warden Lavelle, were some 600 men and women. The Warden is a humane officer, and prisoners often ask the judge to send them to this prison, in preference to the Central Prison, Toronto, though it may mean a longer sentence. The prison is a model of order and cleanliness, the men well behaved and all busy at work.

"Men are just as you treat them," said the governor.

I remarked to him of the men in the blacksmith's shop: "I'd hardly know by their dress that those men are convicts!"

"Why should you?" he replied, and added, "a few years ago, they wore a hideous dress. Now we have three grades of men and, on entrance, all are put into the second class, from which they may rise to the first or fall to the third, and it is a great incentive to them to aspire to the first grade, when they are dressed in ordinary gray-tweed suiting. We find that anything which tends to create and foster self-respect in the men is good for them; all that can be done to elevate a man, we do."

My next visit was to Toronto, where, in the jail, we found the Warden attempting to classify prisoners. Here, we noticed, were cells which were used for two prisoners to sleep in. At the Central Prison, however, I saw much to admire. Here there are no dark cells used and, under the firm but Christian discipline of Warden Massey, the men seem contented and well behaved. By work which they do, they are able to earn money and send it home to their friends. One man usually sends home about ten dollars a month; another lately had $100 to take when he left the jail. Industries of many kinds are in full swing within the prison, the place clean, healthy, and a pattern for others. England needs to learn one lesson from Canada in respect to prison reformation.

On going to the place on Sunday morning, I met thirty gentlemen who were to conduct thirty classes in what is called a Sunday School among the convicts. They seemed an intelligent, level-headed, well-to-do set of men with warm, loving hearts, there to do their Master's work of carrying the Gospel to the "outcasts of Israel," and my soul rejoiced in their mission. Crime has greatly decreased in Canada recently, nor need we wonder at it. There is no stated Chaplain in this jail. The Prisoners' Aid Association arrange to fill the pulpit by the ministers of the town and others.

We had a good Gospel address in which the Lord's love to all mankind was set forth. We began with the Lord's Prayer, a hymn was sung and then Christ was uplifted to these criminals. A touching scene was referred to by one of the workers present. He had picked up a hymn book in which were the following lines: "Mary Douglas, left Scotland July 1881, reached Canada August, same year, once a father's pet and a mother's joy, but now a poor drunkard, but God'll save me yet."

Mary has been advertised for, but we have not heard of her yet. "Let the sighing of the prisoner come before Thee."

IN THE VALLEY.

"When I enter the valley of the shadow of death,
I will fear no evil for thou art with me." Ps. 23: 4.

GOING toward the valley;
Dim the way appears,
Oh! bear me up, my Saviour,
Wipe away my tears.

Going toward the valley,
Nearer, nearer, still.
Oh! put thine arms around me,
Lead me at thy will.

Entering the valley,
Trusting, trusting, still.
Oh! Saviour, lift the shadow;
I know he can and will.

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

THE old life—the life of the body.
Weary, and weak, and old,
Dreading the rain of the autumn,
Dreading the winter's cold;
Fearing the clouds as they gather,
Drifting across the sun,
Dreading the change that cometh
When the work of the earth is done.

Strange is the life of the mortal,
Bending, although he hath trust;
With a brow that is furrowed with anguish,
Bending toward the dust;
Locks that grow white as the snow-drifts,
Form that grows weary and old,
Passing away through the autumn,
Away through the winter's cold.

But, lo! thou weary-eyed mortal,
Look upward! for heaven is true;
The clouds they shall break and scatter,
Above them the sky is blue.
You are traveling on through the autumn,
Passing the white drifts of snow;
And you surely shall reach the spring-time,
Where the valleys bud, waken and blow.

Then do not grow sad in the shadows;
Do not heed the long, long cold,
There cometh the dawn of the spring-time,
When you shall be never more old.
Out through the darkness of night-time,
Your feet must travel to-day,
To reach the glad dawn with its brightness,
Past shadows of night-time's decay.

Signs of the Times.

Indications of the Near Approach of the Crisis Predicted by the Prophets.

BY REV. HENRY VARLEY.*

WHAT would you think of a sea captain out on the ocean who, if you ask him to tell you his latitude and longitude, and when he expected to reach the port, should answer you, "I don't know." You certainly would not feel much confidence in his fitness for his position. And so our Master expects us to know the signs of our times.

All human time is measured by divine institutions; a week by the Sabbath; a month by the moon; a year by the sun, and the earth's revolution around it. And so God has given us the definite measurement of the plan of the ages in his Word, and has furnished us with material for understanding our bearings, and knowing enough of the development of his purpose to be ever ready for his will.

And yet how very few have any intelligent conception of the momentous times in which we are living! How very few rich men there are, especially, who seem interested in the Lord's personal coming! It is not a very pleasant thought for the man of great wealth, if he is much interested in it. The man who has a small millennium on Fifth Avenue is not likely to be looking for the great millennium which Jesus is to bring.

In the twenty-sixth chapter of Leviticus, God has given to us a sketch of Israel's history down to our own times. This was given in the year 1490 before Christ, and it is very wonderful that God should thus early in the history of his people forecast their future. In that passage he says four times that if Israel will not obey him, seven times of judgment will pass over their heads. Now, every intelligent student of prophecy knows that "a time" means a definite period of 360 days or years. In literal chronology it is days; in symbolical chronology a day represents a year.

Later in the ages, in the Book of Daniel, chapter nine, this prophecy is referred to by Daniel as having been fulfilled, and Israel's troubles are recognized as having come upon them, in accordance with God's eternal word; and in another passage, in the fourth chapter of Daniel, the same series of times is distinctly recognized in connection with Nebuchadnezzar, the head of the Gentile kingdoms.

The certainty of prophetic dates has been fully established by the fact that the first coming of our Lord was predicted by Daniel with the utmost definiteness, and not only did he come exactly at the time that Daniel indicated, but it has been shown by Mr. Guinness that he was crucified on the very day that prophecy had foretold. If his first coming was thus definitely foreshadowed, and thus true to the prophetic picture, why may we not as certainly expect that it will be as true of his second advent?

We know where we are on the stream of time, and while to the world that day will come as a thief, yet to those who are looking for him it will be so fully indicated that they shall be ready and waiting as a bride for the appointed day, and shall meet him with joy and glorious expectation.

The Master himself has given us an outlook of the ages, in his own words to his disciples, in the twenty-first chapter of Luke, twenty-third and twenty-fourth verses. He tells us Jerusalem will fall with great slaughter, and her sons and daughters be carried captive unto all nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled. This is simply an anticipation of history. All this has come to pass, and our own eyes behold its fulfillment. In the year 34 our Lord uttered these prophecies, and in the year 64, Titus, the Roman Emperor, came and cast a trench around about the city, as Christ had said, and in the year 70 the city fell.

Sixty generations have passed since then, and we still find them a separated people, dwelling among the nations as strangers and aliens. The Anglo-Saxons who come to America become Americans; the Germans who come to America become Americans; but the sons of Israel never mingle with other people, or cease to be their own unique, peculiar race. Jerusalem is still trodden down of the Gentiles, and will be till the Lord himself comes.

To be Concluded.

FRATERNAL OBLIGATIONS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Jan. 21, Roman 14: 12-23; 15: 1-3.

THE debatable ground between the church and the world is a subject of much concern to many young Christians. Is it wrong, they ask, to drink a glass of wine, wrong to go to the theatre occasionally, it is wrong to go to a horse-race, wrong to play a game of cards? Of two Christians, both of whom hold there is no harm in doing any of these and other things of a similar character, one may indulge in them and the other may scrupulously refrain from doing so. The difference of conduct, while there is no difference of belief usually results from a difference in the view with which each regards the mission of Christianity in the world. There are some Christians who regard it as a mere soul saving institution. To them it is like an insurance company, organized to guarantee happiness after death. By believing certain doctrines, or publicly professing to believe them, by observing certain ordinances and paying certain sums of money, personally or by will, they regard themselves as arranging for an entrance into heaven when they die. In the current phrase, they are in the church "for what there is in it." Their business is to have their soul saved and at as small a cost as possible. Such men regard worldly indulgences as legitimate, if there is no actual sin in them. But there is another view of Christianity and within the past few years, it has found a place in the hearts and lives of a large number of God's people. It is that of Christianity as a world elevating power. It conceives of Christ as coming to rescue the world from sin, to raise men out of the merely animal existence in which they are apt to be content and lead them into a higher spiritual life. While he was here he could not do this on a large scale, but he entrusted the mission to his immediate followers, who were to communicate it to others and they in turn to others and so on through successive generations. Each new disciple was to be a missionary who should induce, by teaching and example, the people with whom he came in contact to cease living for the flesh, which would lead to death, and live for the spirit which would lead to life eternal. They were to point out to them that the Lord died and that to pamper it and indulge it and find happiness in physical sensations was like expending money in beautifying a house which after a few years must be torn down. At death the body must be quit and the spirit, the real man, would be so weak and attenuated by neglect, by the lack of the nourishment it ought to have had during life, that it would be in no condition to enter on a separate existence apart from the body. This secret was committed to each successive generation of Christ's disciples as a sacred trust to be communicated to the world. They were practically to stand in relation of guardians of the race, and win men to the way of life. Such a view of Christ's mission has an enormous influence on life and conduct. A man is not accepted by Christ simply and merely to have his soul saved. He is to be a winner of other men to the new life. When he sees the ways in which they are dragged down and held down in animal life he quits those ways and urges others to avoid them. He is above all desirous to show them that the joys of a spiritual life are sufficient and are better than others. Let that conception of Christianity and of his duty take possession of a man and he is not one of those who will ask, "May I indulge in this or that amusement with safety to my soul?" He will be anxious in all ways, by example and word to lead others to begin the higher life which finds its nourishment in the bread and water of life.

THREE FRIENDS OF CANADA'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

On this page we present this week, portraits of three representatives of religious work among the young people of Canada. The Bishop of Huron, who is associated with the Christian Endeavor Society; Mrs. Elizabeth Tilley, the Dominion Secretary of the King's Daughters, and Mr. Smith L. Walker, who is the recently-elected President of the Nova Scotia Association of the Baptist Young People's Union.

The Rt. Rev. Maurice S. Baldwin, Bishop of Huron, has been an earnest and active friend of

THE BISHOP OF HURON,
(Of the Canadian Christian Endeavor.)

MISS ELIZABETH TILLEY.
(Secretary of the Canadian King's Daughters.)

Christian Endeavor from the first introduction of the movement in Canada. He is a native of Toronto, and is fifty-seven years of age. He was educated at Upper Canada College and Trinity College, and was ordained in 1860 by Dr. Crosby, then Bishop of Huron. During the early years of his ministry he labored successively at St. Thomas, Ont., Port Dover, and at St. Luke's Montreal. He was chosen canon of the cathedral of that city, was subsequently made Dean and in 1883 was appointed Bishop of the Diocese. He is a man of strong Evangelical principles, very earnest and energetic in his ministrations and a prolific author. One of his latest works, "Life in a Look," has had an enormous circulation, and has been the means of doing great good. His address on "Consecration" at the recent Christian Endeavor Convention will never be forgotten by any who heard it. Dr. Baldwin is an earnest student of prophecy and holds, like Mr. Moody, Dr. A. J. Gordon, and the late Pastor Spurgeon, that the Lord's Second Coming will take place before, and not after, the Millennium, and also that we are now in the last times of this dispensation.

Mrs. Elizabeth Tilley is well known by name throughout the Dominion to every circle of King's Daughters. Many have received visits from her and have listened to her inspiring talks; still larger numbers have heard from her by letter who have never met her personally, and these especially will be pleased to see the portrait of her which we publish on this page. Mrs. Tilley was one of the first ladies in Canada to perceive the value of the Order of King's Daughters as an agency of usefulness and give it a practical trial. In her own city of London, Ont., the movement soon became an active and widespread organization, and she gave it the best of her time and energies. She introduced it in other towns and cities by personal visits and by correspondence, and was always glad to give information and advice to girls desiring to form Circles or to Circles which were already formed but needed help. As the movement spread through Canada the need of a Dominion Secretary was felt and was urgently pressed at the Toronto Convention of October, 1891. The appointment was adopted there, and the Convention was unanimous in its choice of the lady best qualified to fill it. Mrs. Tilley was duly elected, and she still holds the office and ably performs its duties.

Mr. Smith L. Walker, the President of the Baptist Young People's Unions of Nova Scotia, is a young physician practicing in Truro. He is descended from an old Colonial family whose ancestors in the days of Washington quitted the newly formed United States for Canada, preferring to give up their estates and begin pioneer work over again rather than renounce allegiance to the English crown. Mr. Walker has inherited the principles and traditions of his forefathers, and is a strong conservative in politics and religion. He was converted in his boyhood and united with the Baptist Church. Having chosen medicine as his profession, he studied at the Acadia University, where he graduated with high honors, and then proceeded to Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York, where he took his diploma three years ago. On his return to Truro he engaged in Sunday School work, and for the past two years has had a phenomenally large Bible class. He identified himself with the Baptist Young People's Union at the start, and has been active in the movement ever since.

(President of the B. Y. P. U. of Nova Scotia.)

THE B. Y. P. U. IN ILLINOIS.

An enthusiastic convention of Baptist Young People's Unions was that recently held in the Memorial Church, of Chicago, of which Rev. L. A. Crandall, D. D., is pastor. The following summary of its proceedings, as reported by the Chicago "Standard," shows that in that city and neighborhood B. Y. P. U. is in a flourishing condition: The roll call of districts brought responses from all save Elgin, from the president of which the secretary had received a letter of regrets, reporting progress in that place. National President John H. Chapman spoke of the progress of the work, reporting many encouraging things. He congratulated the Chicago association as being instrumental in the organization of the International B. Y. P. U. He also alluded to a tour which he has in contemplation, in course of which he will visit a number of the Western States. Reports from chairmen of the several committees were next heard. Miss Margaret Koch told of the work of the juniors. Mrs. A. W. Huyck spoke concerning the reception committee. Mr. Geo. H. Shorney, speaking of mission work, referred to the central work at 316 South Clark Street, where all can find opportunity for service. He supplemented his remarks with greeting from the Chicago Christian Endeavor Union and a statement from President Fisk, of that organization, regarding assistance of the needy poor. Action was taken looking to united effort in this matter, and the district presidents were made a committee to represent the association. Mr. Warren, of Highland Park, reported regarding the Boys' Brigade. The following officers were elected on the recommendation of the nominating committee: President, Norman G. Lenington, Normal Park Church; Vice-President, J. F. O'Brien, Western Avenue Church; Secretary, H. M. Horton, Ravenswood Church; Treasurer, L. G. Tucker, Bethany Church. The committee chairmen are as follows: Missionary, G. H. Shorney; Juniors, Margaret Koch; Boys' Brigade, Charles H. Warren; Education, Hattie St. John; Entertainment, J. Q. Adams; Press, F. G. DeGolyer; Reception, W. H. Huyck.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The new state president of the Indiana Christian Endeavor Union is an honored judge, Judge Kirkpatrick of Kokomo.

The third annual convention of the Black Hills' Epworth Leage, which met at Deadwood, S. D., Dec. 1, is said to have been the largest body of Christian workers that ever met in the Black Hills.

The Epworth League of Boonesville, Ind., recently entertained a large party of old people at the church. Forty of the guests were seventy years old and more. The Ladies' Aid Society provided a good dinner for them.

The Epworth League and Christian Endeavor Society of Galena, Ill., have united to hold a series of six meetings for the purpose of awakening interest in missionary word and in disseminating knowledge concerning it.

Mr. G. Ballew Putnam of Waco, Texas, where the next State convention is to be held, says that in that district Christian Endeavorers have grown from 287 to 1,600, and that by next summer they expect to have 3,000 members.

The Baptist Young People's Unions of Toronto, have been holding a convention in the Emmanuel Baptist Church of that city. Dr. Wilkins, the National Secretary attended and took part in the proceedings. Among the speakers were: Mr. F. L. Ratcliffe, President of the Union; Rev. O. C. S. Wallace, Mr. George J. Hicks and Mr. H. L. Stark.

The King's Daughters' Circle of the Heavenly Healer, Grace Hospital, Toronto, has furnished a ward (children's), and also a free bed for the King's Daughters. This Circle is composed of the superintendent, housekeeper and nurses in the hospital, together with some outside members.

A Christian Endeavor Union in Kansas, reports that during the last year one hundred and twenty-five members of the societies have united with the churches, and the reports show that more earnest personal work has been done than ever before. Several societies have been organized this fall. Junior work is receiving especial attention. There is a general increase of membership.

The District League of the New York East Conference, elected the following officers at its Convention at Norwalk, Conn.: President, Rev. O. S. Curtice; first vice-president, Rev. A. MacRossie; second vice-president, Rev. J. F. Shackleton; third vice-president, Rev. E. R. Foley; fourth vice-president, Frank Moss; corresponding secretary, J. A. Wirth; recording secretary, Rev. J. H. Bell; treasurer, Miss Phoebe A. LeCount.

Prairie Homes.

Tented Towns and Villages that have Sprung up with Mushroom-like Rapidity—Life in the Cherokee Strip.

Life on the prairie is an experience of whose real character no one, who has not passed through it, can form any accurate conception. We read in books of "the boundless prairie," with its waves of billowy grasses, its rich, loamy soil, its seas of summer verdure, and its herds of antelope and buffalo, tempting the hunter to the chase; but we read little of the trials, the struggles and discomforts that attend the efforts to carve a comfortable homestead out of this wide wilderness. Less than half a century ago, in the earlier railroad days, travel across the western prairies was a slow process, and the perils from Indians and wild animals were not few. Now, however, the rapid extension of transportation facilities in all directions, has robbed even the prairies of their solitude. The red man, except in a few remote sections of the country, is no longer a menace to the settler. The locomotive whistle has frightened off the deer and the wild birds, and instead of here and there a solitary homesteader, we find the prairies dotted with cabins and the long grasses giving place before fields of wheat and corn. Man's energy and intelligence are transforming the wilderness and making it "blossom like the rose."

When the Cherokee strip was opened for settlement, a few months ago, there was a great rush of people to secure homes in the new country, much of which was rolling prairie land. Thousands upon thousands crowded in, and soon the vast stretch of territory was dotted with tents and rude structures of rough timber. In this way, the towns of Orlando, and Perry were founded and soon each had a considerable population. Mr. J. P. Lane, the missionary of the American Bible Society for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, has forwarded photographs, showing how the towns now look, after the excitement of the struggle for possession has died out.

One of these photographs is published on this page. The buildings seem to be of the most temporary kind, and hardly calculated to shelter the occupants from the stormy blasts that frequently sweep across the prairies in winter. To one who has lived all his life in settled communities, there is something quite novel in the "shadowing forth" of future greatness and prosperity in a tented town. A mere shed is the principal hotel of the place, while real estate offices, law chambers, dry-goods and general stores are in even less pretentious structures, some with only a canvas covering. Of course, in process of time, stores, banks, schoolhouses and churches arise, and the temporary buildings give place to something more substantial and comfortable; but at the outset, life in a tented town on the open prairie is quite as trying in many respects as that of the pioneer homesteader of earlier days, and without many of its advantages.

Missionary Lane, in a recent letter, gives this description of the prairies: "Deep, narrow, ravines cross them, which are unseen until the edge is reached, when horses and riders go to the bottom. Some people strike matches and drop them in the tall grass. The wind carries the blaze, often burning people to death on these prairies. The Indian has slept on in idleness for ages past, but now another people has broken his slumber of centuries. But when I saw the cruelty and heard the guns fire, as men fought for a town lot, and shot each other down; when I saw saloons and gambling houses begin at once their fearful work, I could readily see that civilization and education alone would never meet the wants of man. While it develops and increases the power, it never has, and never will, control it."

A great Gospel work is needed in the new territory. The multitudes must have Sunday Schools. The field is large and the laborers are, thus far, few indeed. A strong effort is to be made by the American Sunday School Union to secure sufficient funds to establish schools and churches and to disseminate Bible literature, in order that the parents and children of the territory may enjoy much-needed religious advantages, cradle made from a barrel, laid on its side, sawed into shape, furnished with rockers, and covered with cretonne or hand painted. Then there is the settee cradle, which is also a home-made affair with the cradle at one end. The early fathers made very comfortable cradles from hewn-out logs, which were lined with bear or deer skins. The old-fashioned cradle with its low body and rockers, has gone out so completely that it is only in the country that we find it.

Soudanese Marriage Customs.

A curious custom prevails at weddings among the Soudanese Arabs. After various ceremonies, including a procession and a marriage feast, the almost invariable accompaniments of weddings in the east, the bridegroom is led about nine o'clock in the evening into a large, dimly lighted room. Here on one side, huddled upon the floor, are the female relatives and friends of the bride. In the farther corner are four or five maidens of the same height and size, wearing precisely similar clothing and closely veiled. One of these is the bride, and the young man has to find out which it is. If he has been wise, he has bribed one of the old women spectators to give him a secret sign by which to guide his choice. If not, he attempts to seize the veiled figure whom he suspects to be his bride. If possible, she slips from his grasp and runs away, he in hot pursuit. He tears away the veil from her face. If it is his bride, the game is ended, and another ceremony, called the ghalwa, or bride dance, begins. But if he has made a wrong choice, he must try again.

White House Babies.

Recalling the several babies who have christening were Robert E. Lee, then a young lieutenant of engineers, and his wife. The ceremony was held in the East Room, which was gayly illuminated and decorated with flowers."

THE CHILD JESUS.

JESUS was once a little child—
A little child like me,
Was cradled in his mother's arms,
And sat upon her knee.

Once he was just the age I am,
And was as helpless, too;
He used to sleep and walk and speak,
Just as all children do.

And yet, though he was once a child,
He is the Lord of all.
And angel hosts before his throne,
In lowly worship fall.

And why was it he chose to be
A child so poor and weak?
It was that I might learn from him
How blessed are the meek.

It was that I might learn from him
My parents to obey,
And, like the child of Nazareth,
Grow holier every day.

THE DUTY OF RELAXATION.

WHEN you work, work with all your might; but when the measure of one's duty is done, then thoroughly relax. There is as much virtue in refreshing soul and body by yielding up all responsibility and care, as there is in the courageous meeting of active obligations. When we have done our best, says a thoughtful writer, and worked to the limit of our capabilities, then we should rest upon the laws of life, and with the faith of a little child, feel assured the Father is all good, and what is, or must be, is best. If we faithfully do our duty, and repose in peace upon the will of the Father for results, we may have the freedom from anxiety that gives each moment of rest thorough relaxation and pleasure. It is the useless worrying that ages, and robs mature life of its beauty and power. Fretting and worrying never turned a wheel or brought sustaining help to any crisis. We are but children in the arms of the Infinite Father, and rebellion breaks our powers upon the wheel of the law, but does not change the turning of the wheel. In harmony with the law we are carried onward and upward. Resistance is our own destruction. That we cannot make or break is not our care. When our daily duty is done to the best of our cheerful ability, we must rest in heart and brain, in soul and body, and feel the wisdom that produced the marvel of life has a crown for its brave fulfillment. Thus petty trials are forgotten; and great ones dignified.

Graces of Manner.

It is the little graces of manner that make up a charming personality. Few people know how to receive a favor graciously. Ask them to render you a service, and they could not be more ready than they are. But try to offer them a courtesy, and see how quickly you will retire from their presence with a feeling of wounded pride and annoyance. Some will refuse outright, and others will accept as if they were bestowing a royal condescension. To accept something that we do not want, for which we have no use, to accept it in such a manner that the one who offers it will feel that he has rendered a desired service, is the height of consideration and good breeding. The strong, capable and able-bodied do not like to be served. It is much easier to serve one's self than to lie back and be waited upon. They truly feel that it is more blessed to give than to receive—blessed, perhaps, because they do not want to receive. But such people would deny to others what they claim most strenuously for themselves—the right to confer a favor or to discharge an obligation, the sense of which sits heavily upon them.

TENT LIFE IN A NEWLY SETTLED TOWN IN THE CHEROKEE STRIP.

and that a pure, moral atmosphere may prevail where all is now godlessness and vice, and the absorbing greed of gain.

A Wonderful Cradle.

The most celebrated cradle of which there is any account, is that designed for the children of Queen Victoria. It is a marvel of fine wood-carving in the Italian style, from Turkey box-wood. The shape was designed by Victoria herself, and consists of flat head and foot panels, united by a cylinder similar to Italian and French cradles. The carvings are numerous and exquisite. A beautiful female head with closed eyes supported on bats' wings, and surrounded by seven stars, representing night; a bold head of Somnus, surrounded by poppies and carnations tied with ribbons, are the principal decorations. One end represents the arms and national motto of England, and the other crest and insignia of Prince Albert. The arms of England are surrounded by the lion's crest, a bunch of English roses, flying birds, poppies, ornaments spring out of acanthus leaves, two angels' heads, a ball and crown, and friezes of arabesque dolphins.

Among early cradles of pioneers there are many ingenious ones. Among them is the been born in the White House. Alice Graham McCollin writes about them in "The Ladies' Home Journal" in this interesting fashion: "The first of these honors is properly the possession of Mrs. Mary Emily Donelson Wilcox, who was born at the Executive Mansion during Andrew Jackson's first administration, the second child born within its walls, but the oldest now living. To her President Jackson gave the name 'The Sunshine of the White House.' She was the eldest child of Andrew Jackson Donelson and his wife Emily, and was born in the large corner room of the White House fronting on Pennsylvania Avenue. Her christening was an event. The daughter of the Secretary of State, Miss Cora Livingstone, was chosen as godmother, while Martin Van Buren and President Jackson officiated as godfathers. When the baby was brought into the room Mr. Van Buren attempted to take her in his arms, but on her objecting, President Jackson took her and held her throughout the ceremony. She enjoyed the ceremony greatly. When, in the course of the ceremony the clergyman read the question: 'Do you, in the name of this child, renounce the devil and all his works?' Jackson stiffened himself grimly and replied in most emphatic terms: 'I do, sir, I renounce them all!' Among the guests at the Nurse Williams had made but one cut into the turkey when a bell rang. The knife was arrested midway, the plump hands caught the expression of expectancy from lifted chin and fixed eyes.

"There, now! I do hope no poor dear creature is taken bad on Thanksgiving-day!"

By special arrangement, the little daughter of the "folks down-stairs" answered the nurse's bell, and took in messages and notes in her absence.

A hurried run up the stairs, a stride from the upper landing to the sitting-room door, and a double rap were followed by a burly figure overtopped by a good-humored face.

"Good-day! good-day, Nurse Williams! Bless my buttons if I haven't surprised you in a regular carouse, and no mistake. Hi! hi! hi!" walking around the table to get a better view of what it contained. "This is what comes of being a fashionable nurse with no expenses to speak of, and the right to send in thumping bills nobody dares dispute. And I, a poor dog of a doctor, haven't had a mouthful since I was jerked violently from the breakfast-table, and shall think myself well off if I get time to steal so much as a drum-stick at seven o'clock to-night. Things are not evenly divided in this world—no, not if it is Thanksgiving-day!"

"They'll look even to you when you've sat down in this chair and helped me eat my dinner."

She bustled noiselessly about, setting down a second plate to warm on the fender; getting knife, fork and tumbler, talking all the while in placid inattention to the stream of expostulations poured forth by the doctor.

"I understand now—" he heard her say when he desisted in comical despair, and let her push him with gentle urgency into the vacant seat, "I understand perfectly now why I was left to put off my dinner until one o'clock when I had meant as much as anything to have it at half-past twelve. A bit of the stuffing, and a tiny slice of the breast?" heaping his plate, "Now, gravy! O, yes! I know that you high-flyers don't dine until other people's supper-time, but you'd ought to have a hot luncheon to keep the snow-air out of your stomach and lungs, and you can talk better while you are eating than when you are empty. And be better able, when you start out again, to study what's the matter with your patients and what's good for their complaints, if you are full, than if you are fasting. There, now!" resuming her seat with a long breath of benevolent content, "This is what I call a Providence! I'm never so to speak, lone-some, but it did seem a shame, if not a sin, for one lone woman to be sitting down to a genuine Thanksgiving-dinner on a snowy day, with never a soul to speak to."

The doctor's hunger was as genuine as the excellence of the dinner. One whiff of the savory air of the room had assured him on this head; one mouthful told him that he had seldom tasted anything more toothsome in his own house. Moreover, he and Nurse Williams had worked together professionally for a dozen years, and he knew that the surest method of getting his way with her was to let her, in the first place, have hers. He could not help laughing out, in his jovial fashion, now and then, at the holiday adventure, but, being a gentleman at heart, he forebore to intimate how much of his amusement arose from the anticipation of describing to his wife over the seven o'clock family dinner where there would be a dozen of his relatives and hers, where and how he had lunched.

He liked to shock the pretty woman who had married him after his success in his profession was a foregone conclusion, and he could picture her incredulity of dismay.

Out of kindness to his hostess he refrained from "talking shop" until he was sipping the best cup of coffee he had tasted in twenty years.

"You have guessed, I suppose, that you are wanted," he said, then, dropping his tone of good-humored banter. "It is a case of brain-fever—a woman. An ugly case, too, I'm afraid. Some things point to possible pulmonary complications. It seems that she had a bad headache last Friday night, and tried to walk it off. You may recollect that it began to rain about nine o'clock? She came home wet to the skin and slightly delirious. I was called in on Saturday by her brother—a Mr. Lanier, of New York, who had happened to come over to see her and saw at once that she was in a bad way. Her daughter, an intelligent, handy girl of sixteen, or thereabouts, is at boarding-school in New York, but came home on Saturday to spend Sunday, and would not go back on Monday and leave her mother so ill. She does her best in the sick-room, and so does an elderly Scotch woman who is a sort of maid-of-all-work in the family, and a capital nurse at that. But there's a houseful of younger children, and all that, you know, and the time has come, as her brother and I concluded this morning, when other assistance is required. Can you go?"

"Right away?"

"I'm afraid I must say 'yes,' brain-fever is 'nt a thing to be trifled with."

She nodded gravely.

"You're right. Is she out of her head still?"

"Raving—when she is not in a stupor. Eyes glassy; disposed to roll her head and to pick at the bed-clothes. Temperature an average of one hundred and five. You know the signs. Knows nobody, and calls constantly, when awake, for her husband who is abroad, and for her mother, who is dead. Came home Friday night with a story of having heard her mother call her by name three times on the street. Took it for a sign and keeps referring to it."

"Such things have happened. It's a very thin curtain that hangs between us and them who have passed out of our sight, and we are leaning all our weight against it most of the time. 'Taint surprising that it should give way in spots once in awhile."

"Yes! yes! but you see, my good sister, this woman is my patient, and I don't want that curtain to give way under her weight, for good and all. You must help me jarn those thin places you talk about so coolly. Out of simple humanity, if professional pride don't move you. There are all those little children, you know—not to mention the husband."

"It's as well not to mention some husbands sometimes," retorted the nurse with grim pleasantry aimed evidently at him. "But children can have only one mother"—relapsing into seriousness. "I'll be off in an hour, if that will do. As you say, this sort of thing can't be fooled with, and it seems to have got pretty well under way already. Where is it?"

"Not far away. No. 363 Mendelbras ave. The name is Paul."

"I had three cases of measles at 362 last year. They know that I am coming?"

"I promised to send a trained nurse before dark. I am uncommonly lucky in finding you at home, and disengaged."

"Speaking after the manner of men—yes!"

Dr. Bacon's eyes twinkled as at a challenge. He stood up, brushed a few crumbs from his knee, and glanced at his hat and the overcoat he had tossed upon a chair.

"What ought I to say if I spoke after the manner of women?" he queried, quizzically.

"Depends upon who the women are."

She was clearing away the remnants of the dinner, rapidly and with surprisingly little noise for a woman of her size. Plates did not clatter, glasses did not ring, or silver rattle.

"You'll excuse me going on with this work," she said, apologetically. "I haven't a minute to lose, if I'm to be on duty before dark."

"If you were the woman—for example?" pursued the doctor, teasingly. "What should I say then of my luck?"

"I should say there is no such word in my dictionary. Nor in God's Word. Nor in his world either, for that matter. It is his will, his wise and merciful planning for our good—which we call providence—that brings all things to pass. Nothing happens by chance."

Dr. Bacon took up an argumentative position upon the hearth-rug. He knew that he was wasting time here, but he was loth to rush off immediately after swallowing a hearty dinner; the room was cozily-warm; the out-door prospect more and more disagreeable by contrast. He would be amused, and "laze" for ten minutes more before he took himself by the shoulder and turned him into the storm.

"I've heard you say so often enough for me to begin to believe it if I could elevate my opinion of myself, or of any other ordinary mortal, to the point of fancying that the Maker of the universe concerns himself about my hourly goings and comings."

"If you'd take the pains to make a valuable machine, I guess you'd concern yourself to look after it, and see if it was running regularly and smooth," interposed the nurse, quietly.

"But I haven't learned the secret of perpetual motion, you see, and he has got it down fine. According to my way of thinking, he has established general laws for the government of whatever he has made, and these laws go on, acting and reacting, from year to year, and from century to century. Men are born, and live, and die, keep well and get ill; make money and lose it; are happy or miserable in obedience to these general laws. Just as trees put out leaves in the spring and shed their leaves in the autumn. Some fruit comes to perfection, and some drops to the ground and decays unripe. Some men live to a good old age, and as many, who are born into the world, die in infancy. We can account for the death of one as well or as poorly as for the other. The individual man is no more in the eyes of Deity, than one of those snow-flakes out there, that flutters from the clouds to the ground to be melted as soon as the sun comes out, and be soaked up by the earth."

"Yes?" in civil reserve of her opinion. "I beg your pardon, Doctor, but there's a hair upon your sleeve!"

She plucked it off with a respectful thumb and finger, and regarded it attentively, holding it between her eyes and the window.

"It's a gray hair too!" meditatively. "Probably. There are as many of that kind as there are brown upon my head and face. I look more and more to myself like a gray racoon each morning when I stand before the mirror."

She was still gazing at the hair. One might have detected a shade of reverence in her manner of inspecting it.

"He says that he has counted them all," she began, musingly. "Every one in your head is a reminder of the close watch he keeps over you."

Still gently, she let the hair fall upon the hearth, and turned toward the window.

"I was a-pitying the sparrows just awhile ago. A row of 'em sat on my window-sill. They know when I'm at home as well as if they'd rung the bell and had their answer at the down-stairs door. I keep a pile of crumbs on the window-sill for them, but to-day the snow had covered them up. So I swept it off clean, and spread their table again for 'em. While they were a-eating it came to me how many city-sparrows must starve if the snow lay long on the ground, and as quick as that thought popped into my faithless and foolish mind, I recollected that he who made 'em keeps account of their needs, and of every one that falls to the ground, and how he has said in so many words—not leaving us to work out the sum for ourselves,—that we are of more value than many sparrows. It's the cheapest bird in the Holy Land, so I've heard tell, and pity knows for all the good they seem to do, or the use they are as human creatures' food, they are dear in America at any price. I should calculate now,"—her head on one side, her eyes measuring his goodly proportions, with never a glimmer of a smile—

"that a man like you, in whose hands are the issues of life and death—under the Almighty—for hundreds of people every year, must be worth more than fifty millions of them noisy little birds."

Dr. Bacon's sides shook with his jovial laugh.

"The sparrows might think differently if you were to leave the decision to them. Thank you, all the same, for your good opinion, and for the Thanksgiving sermon. I haven't been to church on Thanksgiving Day for thirty years, that I recollect. I should probably go to sleep if I did. Your lecture has kept me awake."

He moved towards the door, but stopped midway to look at something hanging on the wall.

"Halloo! You have been treating yourself to some new decorations since I was here last. What is it all about?"

CHAPTER V.

"Our life is determined for us; and it makes the mind very free when we give up wishing, and only think of bearing what is laid upon us, and doing what is given us to do."—George Eliot.

"What is meant by our neighbor we cannot doubt; it is everyone with whom we are brought into contact. It is everyone who is thrown across our path by the changes and chances of life: he, or she, who-soever it may be, whom we have any means of helping."—Dean Stanley.

The doctor's overcoat lay over the back of a chair where he had tossed it upon entering, and immediately above it was the new frame that had arrested his attention. It was a tasteful affair in white-and-gold, and within it was what looked at the first glance like a testimonial or certificate, engrossed upon white vellum, with an illuminated border.

Mrs. Williams smoothed her apron with both plump palms, and approached her visitor, gratification beaming from every line of her visage.

"Ah! you may well stop to look at it. Just read it aloud—won't you? And then I'll tell you how I came by anything so nice."

Dr. Bacon settled his gold-bowed eyeglasses upon his nose, and complied. He read with deliberation, pausing after each verse, as if to satisfy himself that he had rendered it with proper emphasis and discretion. The nurse hearkened with the eagerness of one who never listened to it before: her eyes serious, her mouth smiling tenderly; once in awhile a gentle nod signified her appreciation of a favorite passage.

As the shepherd lifts the hurdle
Daily set about his sheep,
Shifts aside the wadded girdle,
Wills the flock to feed and sleep
Within bounds his wisdom orders,
Faring as his love assigns,
Pining not for richer borders,
Chafing not at strait confines—

So, O Father when the morning
Grayly steals into my room,
Be it promise, and not warning,
Earnest of perfected bloom,
Of wise willing and wise giving:
To my restless spirit say,
"All thou has to learn of living Is to do My will to-day."

Yesterdays—their prayers, their sinning,
Bootless cares and futile tears,
Thwarted end and rash beginning,
Are with Thine eternal years,
Tales all told, and sealed pages—
Turn I steadfastly away,
And from out the coming ages
Reverent take the virgin day.

Grace sublime of simple trusting Grant unto Thy servant, Lord!
Without friction, without rusting,
I would take Thee at Thy word.
Nothing bodily and naught asking
Of the dim and outer land,
Glad to do the tender tasking
Daily laid unto my hand.

It may be the safe surrounding
Of Thine angel's banding wings
Shall appoint fair friends, abounding
With the dew of Baka's springs.
If, instead of beauty, burning
Be the measure of Thy will,
Let eyes made by faith discerning See the shining ones there still.

"I am not much of a judge of poetry," remarked the reader when he had finished. "But that sounds pretty and pleasant. Its awfully impractical, of course, but poetry doesn't set up for that, as a rule."

"There was one gentleman who wrote for the papers, whose wife I nursed, who found a scrap of paper with those verses on it, lying on my bureau, and he said it was 'good religion, but poor poetry.'" I cut it out of my weekly paper in the first place, and I'd read it over so many times it was quite threadbare when we got hold of it. I told him he'd maybe like it better if it had been in better shape. I took such a fancy to it, not being literary enough to know poetry from prose, that I got into a way of singing it when I was by myself. It goes well to Greenville, Nettleton, or Autumn, or any other eight-by-seven tune."

"It is handsomely copied and decorated," said the physician, kindly suppressing a smile.

A Great Bible Revival.

not only in the churches but among multitudes who till now were alien from spiritual influences and associations. Indeed, it may be truthfully said that from the very beginning the Divine blessing was manifestly with the enterprise. To those journals that have now joined in this glorious work, we extend cordial welcome, and trust it may please God to give them the same measure of blessing that has been granted to ourselves.

The outlay connected with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD plan of Bible distribution has been very heavy. Instead of attempting to make a profit on these Bibles, a large percentage of the income of the paper has for three years been applied to the project. Up to the present time, the outlay from this source, for the purchase of Teachers' Bibles, has already exceeded $125,000, and an additional $25,000 have been expended in postage and express charges on Bibles distributed. During the years 1891, 1892 and 1893, the total shipments by express in our distribution of the Bibles, have been larger than those of any other shipper in the United States. The handling of these Bibles has given employment to an army of deavorers, Young People's Unions and King's Daughters, and in a multitude of centres of Christian influence and activity. May the Lord inspire his people everywhere to help promote a Gospel movement, so nobly and generously inaugurated."

Amid such genuine sympathy and support from Christians on every hand, the Bible revival goes on with steadily increasing momentum. "My Word shall not return unto me void," saith the Lord, and surely there can be no higher missionary work than the spreading of the Word among all classes and conditions of men. Each separate volume is an evangel of light, that helps forward the better day. Three hundred thousand printed Teachers' Bibles, already distributed, make a potent array of workers for Christ. Five hundred thousand would be better; a million best of all! Every child of the Light should pray and work that the day may soon come when no home in America will be without the Bible.

It is fortunate for mankind that the age has passed when the Bible was a costly book, to be possessed only by the few and when its spiritual treasures were jealously guarded from the common gaze. With the exception of Spain and Peru the Word is now practically everywhere as free as air that I have visited have I seen people more contented and happy. Their poor are not in such abject poverty as I have seen in other countries. Then their workingmen go to church on Sundays—a habit they have got from their Bibles—but they benefit by it for they are not wasting their wages in pleasure or their health in dissipation as do the working men in other lands. Their immigrants are among the best who land on our shores. Of all the foreigners who come here none are more sought after for positions in which integrity is essential. It has become almost a proverb that you can find them everywhere but in the alms-house, the tavern and the jail. That is a pretty good character for a nation to have, three thousand miles away from home, and they have the same character as far east as this is west, for I heard it in India. When I tried to analyze their character I found that they were as diverse as other nationalities, but all of them had the same characteristic of having been steeped and saturated in childhood with the Bible. When you spoke just now, Mr. Paine, about the Bible being a book for fools and knaves, this thing was recalled to me. How do you account for it?"

Paine rose and said he had had enough of argument and was going to bed. He went upstairs and, one by one, his disciples stole out. After they were gone, the stranger who had looked in was alone with the speaker who had talking about the Bible. "I wish," said the latter, "Mr. Paine had not been so tired; I should like to have heard his explanation of this and that other fact that individuals and families are affected in the same way. Your Bible-reading families are the best neighbors and citizens. I wish some one who believes that the Bible is a book fit only for fools and knaves would tell me how it is that it tends to the production of honest men." The man ended with a sigh as of one bewildered and the stranger said to him: "You may as well ask them to square the circle. A corrupt tree never yet brought forth good fruit. The book that elevates man must be a good book and I wish it was in every home in the land."

PROBLEM OF THE UNEMPLOYED.

It will cost the community no more to pay the unemployed relief as wages than to bestow it upon them as alms, writes the Rev. Washington Gladden in "The Review of Reviews." But the economical and moral advantage to the recipients themselves and to the community of putting it in the form of wages is simply immeasurable. It is, therefore, the duty of every citizen to exhaust his ingenuity in inventing ways of furnishing work to persons whom he knows to be in need of it. These lines will fall under the eyes of many men and women of good will who know that they will be required to give during this winter some portion of their income for the relief of want.

If all these would invent some way of spending this money for work, and would find some unemployed persons, male or female, who are suffering for the need of work, and would permit them to earn this money, a large share of the existing want would be immediately relieved. The problem of making work and of bringing the task and the toiler together, is one that requires some thought and ingenuity, some trouble and pains, no doubt; but many of my readers can solve it, if they will give it half as much study as they will expend upon the costume for the next high tea.

Prevent the Grip

Dr. Cyrus Edson of the New York Board of Health says that to prevent the Grip, you should avoid exposure in inclement weather, and keep your strength up, your blood in good condition and your digestive organs in regular action. The tonic and alterative effects of Hood's Sarsaparilla so happily meet the last three conditions, that with the protection given by this medicine you need not fear the Grip. Many people confidently rely upon Hood's Sarsaparilla for protection from the Grip, Fevers, etc.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is an inexpensive medicine and a single bottle may save you many dollars in doctors' bills and much suffering. Truly an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Be sure to get Hood's, men and women in the Premium Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, where the vast quantities of books are prepared for shipment—as many as 6,000 packages being shipped in a single day. Every day saw thousands of copies of the sacred volume sent out like winged messengers to all parts of the world—to every State and Territory, to Mexico and Alaska, the isles of the Pacific, China, Burmah, Siam, India, Africa, Persia and other lands, to be used in private homes, in schools and missions, by Christian workers in the field and by God's people in every station and calling. Dr. Klopsch has also expended $100,000 more in advertising, in order that these Teachers' Bibles, with their great stores of knowledge, might be placed in the homes of Christian families. So great was the demand for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD issue of December 6, last, containing the full statement of the premium plan of distribution of the Teachers' Bible—which our readers will doubtless remember—that an edition of 458,000 of that issue was rendered necessary.

ADDRESSING TEACHERS' BIBLES IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD PREMIUM DEPARTMENT.

Some of the letters we are constantly receiving, are from men and women who have been active in spiritual work for many years, and who testify most cordially to the good work thus far accomplished. One writer says:

"It should be a source of deep gratification for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and Dr. Klopsch to be the means, under divine Providence, of spreading the blessed Word as I believe no other single agency has done since the days of Caxton and Tyndale. I'm thankful to be associated, even in a humble degree, with a movement so widespread and beneficent and which cannot fail to be followed by the richest spiritual results, since it places the most complete Bible ever printed in the hands of thousands upon thousands of families and of countless workers in churches, Sunday Schools, Epworth Leagues, Christian Ento all peoples. In 1804 it was accessible to only 200 millions of men; now it is printed in the tongues spoken by 800 millions. Even in distant China, where, only a few years ago, a native student laboriously copied in his own handwriting a New Testament he had succeeded in borrowing for a time, sitting up nights to do it, the Bible is no longer a prohibited volume, under the official ban. It is the consoler of the Christian everywhere, his spiritual staff and comfort in this life, and his firm assurance of happiness hereafter.

Star of Eternity! the only star
By which the bark of man can navigate
The sea of life and gain the coast of heaven.

It would be no exaggeration to declare that a man who sincerely loved his country could do it no better service than to see that there was a Bible in every home in it. Wherever the Bible is read and studied the people are better materially, as well as morally and spiritually. A remarkable testimony to this effect was once given in an argument in the house of the notorious infidel Tom Paine. A gentleman was passing the window of that house one day, and seeing Paine seated near it, stepped in and listened to the conversation. Paine and seven or eight friends who were seated in the room, were talking about the Bible and Paine was declaring, with his usual force and emphasis, that the book was read only by fools and knaves and ought to be excluded from the home of every intelligent, honest man. "Have you ever been in Scotland, Mr. Paine?" asked one of the company. "Yes," said Mr. Paine. "So have I," said the other, "and the people are the greatest bigots about the Bible I ever met. It is their school-book; their houses and churches are furnished with Bibles, and if they travel but a few miles from home, their Bible is always their companion; yet I am obliged to admit that in no country

THE BOOK SHELF

THE MAKING OF A DICTIONARY.*

ONE of the great literary events of the year has been the publication of the first volume of the "Standard Dictionary of the English Language," by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, publishers, New York. The entire dictionary will be complete in two volumes, and it is expected that it will also be issued in single volume form, the whole work being completed by May 1st, 1894. No such thorough, comprehensive, and really valuable dictionary has been attempted heretofore. It is now four years since the work was begun, and there have been engaged in its production during that time, 247 editors and specialists, and nearly 500 readers for references and quotations, besides several hundred other assistants of both sexes, who have rendered effective service in various ways in the defining or classification of words. Nearly $500,000 have been expended in the preparation of the dictionary thus far, and it will cost little less than a million when complete. The vocabulary is exceedingly full and varied, and some idea of its comprehensiveness may be gathered from the statement that while Johnson's dictionary had in the letter "A" 2800 words, Worcester's 6900 words, Stormonth's 5000 words, Webster's 8500 words, and Century 15,000 words, the Standard has nearly 20,000 in "A" altogether. In the entire alphabet, it has nearly 300,000 words as against 225,000 words in the next largest. Necessarily, it embraces a very large number of terms not hitherto found in any dictionary, but which have now come into general use and are recognized as a part of our language. The Standard Dictionary is one of the most conclusive evidences of the growth of the English language that could be found.

To enumerate the many features of merit and value in this great dictionary, would be a difficult matter. Among the very able specialists who have been contributors in the different departments, may be mentioned such names as Max Muller, R. Ogden Doremus, President W. R. Harper of Chicago University, Hubert Bancroft, Theodore Gill, Prof. William Hallock, Dr. Sayce of Oxford, Prof. Goodell of Yale, Prof. Skeat of Cambridge, England, Dr. Murray of Oxford, England, and a host of others, eminent in art, literature, science and the various professions. The dictionary has received the highest encomiums from the literary authorities of the great universities of the world, as a work that will be of invaluable service, and that will last as long as the English language remains essentially unchanged. In accuracy, clearness and fullness, it is regarded as surpassing all others.

One of the features of the work is its wealth of pictorial illustrations. There are nearly 5,000 engravings made expressly for the Standard Dictionary, over 4,000 being woodcuts, and others full-page groups, in color, &c. In the introduction to the first volume, the publishers say: "Great efforts have been put forth to gather the words that have an extensive local usage among various English-speaking peoples. Specialists were assigned to the task of collecting and defining words peculiar to England and Scotland, to various parts of North America, to Australia, to South Africa; of collecting and defining Anglo-Indian words, Anglo-African words, Anglo-Spanish words, &c. Much care has also been taken to include terms common among the English-speaking people living in South-American countries, in Japan, in China, and on many islands of the sea."

"Care has been exercised to avoid the recognition of needless new literary terms—words coined by the caprice or mistaken judgment of this or that author. It is no longer necessary for a lexicographer to justify the recognition of new words, or the adoption of old words to express new meanings and new relations; but there is still room for the exercise of caution and careful judgment. The newly-coined literary words were first carefully considered by the office editors, and if the words were thought by them to have merit they were referred to the Committee of New Words.

"Disputed spellings and pronunciations have been referred to an Advisory Committee of fifty (for parts of the alphabet more than fifty, and for other parts a few less than that number) philologists in American, English, Canadian, Australian, and East Indian universities, and representative professional writers and speakers in English. The exact meanings given by authors of recognized standing have been very extensively verified by a critical examination of many hundred thousand quotations. The books read with this object in view were selected under the direction of the editorial department, and great care was exercised to have the list include all that may be considered authoritative in determining the meaning of words. Nearly 100,000 volumes were examined for this purpose.

"The meaning of a word has been traced back, step by step, in a direct line, avoiding mere guesses at derivations and the temptation to make extended incursions into cognate languages. The advantages of giving, along with the English word, the word similar to it in sound, form or idea, in the Dutch, German, Swedish, French, or Italian, have not appeared sufficient to justify the use of so much valuable space."

THE WORLD'S PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.*

The first volume of this valuable and comprehensive record of the work of the recent Religious Congress in Chicago is rich both in literary contents and illustrations. It contains a large number of addresses made and papers read before the Congress, by distinguished delegates from all parts of the world, and it also gives a complete history of the Congress itself from the moment of its conception to the final adjournment of the last session. Speaking of the book, Rev. John Henry Barrows in his editorial preface says:

"This book records a grand event, the most important incident of the greatest of World Expositions. In preparing for it, the editor of these volumes has been brought into friendly and delightful relations with Catholic Archbishops, Greek Priests, Jewish Rabbis, disciples of Buddhism and followers of the gravely-wise Confucius. Pleasant friendships have been formed with men of a score of different denominations. Contact with the learned minds of India has inspired a new reverence for the thought of the Orient. He has seen in imagination Milton's

Dusk faces, with white silken turbans wreathed.

And, in the disciples of Zoroaster and of the Prophet of Islam, he has found the spirit of the truest human brotherhood.

This book will show man seeking after God, and it will also tell the diviner story of God seeking after man.

Striking the noble chord of universal human brotherhood, the promoters of the World's First Parliament of Religions have evoked a stately music which will yet drown the miserable discords of earth.

This book is the record of man's best thinking to-day on the greatest of themes. For the first time in all the centuries, the wonders of Art and Science and the wonders of Faith and Thought have been exhibited side by side.

This book will be read in the cloisters of Japanese scholars, by the shores of the Yellow Sea, by the water-courses of India and beneath the shadows of Asiatic mountains near which rose the primal habitations of man. It is believed that the Oriental reader will discover in these volumes the source of strength of that simple faith in Divine Fatherhood and Human Brotherhood, which, embodied in an Asiatic Peasant who was the Son of God and made divinely potent through him, is clasping the globe with bands of heavenly light."

The Late W. H. Howland.

Death of Toronto's Honored ex-Mayor, Christian Worker and Munificent Philanthropist.

It is with sincere sorrow that we chronicle the death of Mr. Howland, the distinguished citizen of Toronto, whose labors in the cause of morality and religion have often been reported in these columns. The news comes upon us as a surprise, for Mr. Howland was a remarkably active, vigorous man, not more than fifty years old, and was busily engaged in benevolent work. Such deaths as his test the quality of our faith, and we have to remind ourselves that the world is governed by a Being all-wise as well as all-loving.

HON. W. H. HOWLAND. as all-loving. We have to hold fast that faith and wait to learn more of Him and his ways, for it seems strange to us that death should be allowed to pass over men whose days are spent in working mischief, and take one who was so helpful and so good.

Mr. Howland was the son of Sir William P. Howland of Toronto. He was a successful business man and was distinguished by the consistency with which he carried into business life the principles of religion. It is remembered of him that when he was made receiver of the Central Bank of Toronto, the failure of which menaced many citizens with ruin, his first act was to assemble in the bank-parlor his colleagues and clerks and ask divine guidance in the extremely difficult task they were beginning, and that they might be so directed that no man might suffer loss or injustice by their mismanagement. Mr. Howland was twice elected mayor of the city and was urged to accept a third term, but declined. Over the mayor's chair the motto was emblazoned by his order at the beginning of his first term, "Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Mr. Howland's terms were exceedingly beneficial to the city. He succeeded in closing disreputable saloons and holding those which retained their licenses to a strict observance of the law. During his administration, Toronto attained the distinction of being the most moral and religious city of its size on the continent. His upright and manly course earned for him the good-will of all citizens, and even those who were driven out of business by his conscientious official action, found in him a personal friend willing to help them with advice and money to enter an honest walk in life. Mr. Howland was the founder of several philanthropic institutions to which he gave liberally not only money, but valuable time. He was also Vice-President of the International Association of Christian Workers, President of the Dominion Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, the Prisoners' Aid Association and the Temperance Alliance. His death makes many vacancies which it will be difficult to fill.

THE CONVERT'S DUTY.

What should a religious teacher do, when he discovers that he has been teaching error for many years? If light breaks on his mind and he perceives that he was mistaken in what he taught, although when he taught it he believed it to be true; what is his duty then? Should he quit his pulpit, or should he impart to his people the light that has broken on his own soul and so undo the mischief he has done in unintentionally leading them astray. The latter seems clearly to his duty, yet we have had some conspicuous examples recently, of men being condemned for doing it. They have been told that when they cease to believe the creed of their church they ought to leave the church. It appears that the Jews have the same opinion. In one of the Synagogues of Hungary a learned rabbi, named Lichtenstein, has been preaching for nearly forty years. During the past few years the conviction has been growing in his mind that Jesus of Nazareth is he of whom the prophets wrote. It was faint and easily stifled at first, but it provoked further study and deepened as he compared the New Testament and the prophetic writings, until it reached certainty. Then he declared it to his people. It was expected that he would at once join a Christian church; but he refused. "My place is here," he said, "the people whom I have been teaching to look for the Messiah, ought to know from my lips that I have found him. Why should I leave them? We have been forty years together, and I have given them my best thought and leading. Should I leave them now that I have a better word for them than any I have yet spoken? They are mistaken about Jesus, as I was, and I helped to blind their eyes; now I must try to open them, as my eyes have been opened. So he preached Christ in his synagogue, and his people, who love and venerate him, listened eagerly. But other Jewish Rabbis have interfered, and insist that he shall leave. They say that the synagogue was not built to be used for preaching Christ, and contend that the Rabbi is a traitor. It is now announced that they have triumphed and the Rabbi has been expelled.

I'LL SOON BE GOING HOME.

It need not matter what my life shall be,
Nor where my path must go,
For Christ is my Shepherd and he walks with me
Where peaceful waters flow.

Oh! I'll soon be going home,
Never, never more to roam.

Yes, I'll soon be going home,
Where the "many mansions" be,
There is promised one for me.
And I'll soon be going home.

In the dreary shadows of a desert land,
Where grief and pain abide,
With loving compassion he will hold my hand,
And keep me by his side.

If the joy is bitter that my soul must
Or joy o'erflow the brim, [drink,
My Saviour will hold it that I need not
But trust it all with him. [shrink,

It need not matter if I go in youth,
Or low bowed down with years—
My Father will meet me in that land of truth,
And wipe away all tears.

Oh! I'll soon be going home,
Never never more to roam—

Yes, I'll soon be going home—
Where the "many mansions" be
There is promised one for me,
And I'll soon be going home.

CONVERTS AMONG THE AINUS.

Much has been written about the degradation of the Ainus, who live in the northern of the Japanese Islands. It has been said again and again that there was no basis in their natures for religious work and that all effort spent upon them would be wasted. The Rev. J. Batchelor, who has been working among them, writes that he worked from 1882 to 1885 before one convert was baptised into the Church of Christ, and that in 1891 there had only been nine converts for nine years' work. But "after the sowing and preparation work, this year will ever be remembered as the reaping year among the Ainu, for already there have been 171 baptisms this year, thus making a Church membership of 179 souls, one having died. There are still about 200 candidates! Every woman in Piratori is among the seekers for the new faith. That is a glorious triumph for the Cross, for the women hitherto have never been allowed to have any religion, the men only have been allowed to join in the public worship. Just think of old women over seventy years of age,

MR. MILLS IN MICHIGAN.

Rev. B. Fay Mills has labored for several weeks at Grand Rapids, Mich., and the city was greatly blessed. The churches are revived and hundreds have confessed Christ. Mr. Mills has labored for ten days in Ann Arbor, Mich., and his work has been eminently blessed, especially among the three thousand students in the University. Many promising young men have been converted and it is believed will consecrate their future to Christian work.

Indisputable Evidence

Of the Successful Treatment of Consumption and Chest Diseases by the English Method, as Discovered and Practised by George Thomas Congreve.

FOURTH INTERVIEW.

By the Special Commissioner.

With CAPTAIN ALFORD, Salvation Army Barracks, Exeter.

I first heard of the case of Capt. Alford from Miss Churton, attached to the Marlborough College, Exeter; Miss Bamber, the principal of that establishment, having induced Capt. Alford to try Mr. Congreve's remedies. At that time he was, to all appearance very ill, and it is certain that his recovery is due entirely to the treatment referred to; for I have not only the testimony of Miss Churton to that effect, but also that of Mr. Potter, a picture-frame maker, of Holloway street, in the same city, as well as that of the patient himself, with whom I had a brief chat at my hotel in Exeter.

"Will you be good enough to tell me, captain, what was the matter with you when you commenced Mr. Congreve's treatment upon the recommendation of Miss Bamber?"

"I had very bad congestion of the lungs, a complaint from which I have suffered during the last five years, brought on by exposure and pressure of work."

"I suppose you have had medical advice?"

"Oh, yes; I have been under several doctors, among them a doctor at Hampstead. It has usually taken three months for me to get over each recurring attack."

"And I take it that each succeeding attack was no less severe?"

"Not less severe, in fact, worse. At last I became very ill, so ill that I didn't think much of my life."

"But isn't it possible that you took too gloomy a view of the position?"

"I don't think so. Moreover, the doctor told me my life was in danger. I brought up a quantity of fluid blood, and lost flesh to an alarming extent. For the first time I had two attacks—one close upon the other."

"And then, I am told, you commenced to take Mr. Congreve's medicines?"

"Yes, at the suggestion of Miss Bamber."

"Had you any previous knowledge of it, Captain Alford?"

"Not much; but I remember when I was at Maidstone I saw the good it did in one very bad case."

"And what have you to say about its effect in your own?"

"It did me an immense amount of good—no doubt of it. In a month I had quite recovered, and have kept well and strong since, better than I have been for a long time."

"I am told that you are able to play a wind instrument now, Captain?"

"Yes, I play a brass instrument, often, and without any ill effect."

In reply to a further question, Captain

Alford accorded me his permission to make any reference to his case I thought advisable; and then, as he had to proceed to Exmouth to take part in a service there, he hurried away to his train.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of 50 cts., $1.00, $1.75, $3.75 or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn farmer
My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

WHERE CRUSADERS WORSHIPPED.

Founding the First German Protestant Church in Jerusalem, on the Site of the Ancient "Muristan"—A Sultan's Gift to an Emperor.

JERUSALEM, although under Turkish rule, is by no means the distinctively Moslem city it was some twenty years ago, when the intolerance, which is the traditional characteristic of the Turk in religious matters, was strongly marked. Not only are the Armenians, Copts, Greeks and Latins tolerated and permitted to enjoy freedom of worship unmolested, in their own churches and chapels, but there are several other sects and denominations that exercise the same privilege. Such a policy is a great advance in religious liberality on the part of a people whose religious propaganda was for many centuries carried on with the sword, and to whom the whole world, outside of Mohammedanism was "glaour" and "infidel," and fit only for forcible conversions or ruthless slaughter. Hospitals, schools and missions, erected by the various Christian churches of other lands, are permitted to flourish and extend their several fields of work until they have at last won their way into the obdurate Moslem heart and Mohammedan patients and pupils are now found side by side with the sons and daughters of Syria, Greece and Egypt.

An occasion which demonstrates the tolerant and progressive spirit of the Moslem rulers of Palestine, was the recent ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the first German Protestant Church in Jerusalem. It took place in the presence of a distinguished official sent by the German Emperor, the German Consul and his staff, a large assembly of German residents and the Turkish Governor of Jerusalem. Right Rev. Dr. Blyth, Anglican Bishop in Jerusalem, personally assisted. Our illustration on this page is from a photograph by Krikorian of Jerusalem, forwarded expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Ferdinand Vester, a prominent German resident of Palestine, and who, with his son, lately visited this country in connection with his Oriental exhibits at the World's Fair, has furnished THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with an interesting and authentic history of the events connected with the acquisition of the site for the new church. In 1869, Crown Prince Frederick of Prussia (who afterward became Emperor Frederick I. of Germany), after attending the opening ceremonies at the Suez Canal, visited Sultan Abdul Aziz at Constantinople. The Sultan received the Crown Prince with great distinction, and as a mark of special favor, presented him with a firman, which conveyed to his distinguished father, the late Emperor William I, a large plot of ground in the city of Jerusalem. On this ground once stood the historical ruin known as the "Muristan," a building erected by the Crusaders about the tenth century and used as a fortress and house of worship, being known as the "Church of Santa Maria Latina." Here it is said, the Knights Templars or Knights of St. John, once had their strong hold and cloisters; but the passing centuries had reduced the once splendid and spacious edifice to a ruin, and at the time of the transfer by Abdul Aziz, the ground was used as a slaughtering place, and a receptacle for the refuse of a very large part of the city of Jerusalem.

On a Sunday, in the latter part of November, 1869, Crown Prince Frederick, who had come to the Holy Land for that especial purpose, took formal possession of the Muristan in the name of his own government and people. The Muristan was surrounded

WHERE'S MOTHER?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Judges 5: 28: "The mother of Sisera looked out at a window."

PIKED to the ground of Jael's tent lay the dead Commander-in-Chief of the Canaanitish host, General Sisera, not far from the river Kishon, which was only a dry bed of pebbles when in 1880, in Palestine, we crossed it, but the gullies and ravines which ran into it indicated the possibility of great freshets like the one at the time of the text. General Sisera had gone out with nine hundred iron chariots, but he was defeated, and his chariot-wheels interlocked with the wheels of other chariots, he could not retreat fast enough and so he leaped to the ground and ran till exhausted he went into Jael's tent for safety. She had just been churning, and when he asked for water she gave him buttermilk which in the East is considered a most refreshing drink. Very tired, and supposing he was safe, he went to sleep upon the floor, but Jael who had resolved upon his death, took a tent-pin long and round and sharp, and a hammer, and putting the sharp end of the tent-pin to the forehead of Sisera with one hand, with her other hand she lifted the hammer and brought it down on the head of the pin with a stout stroke, when Sisera struggled to rise, and she struck him again, and he struggled to rise, and the third time she struck him, and the commander-in-chief of the Canaanitish host lay dead.

Meanwhile in the distance Sisera's mother sits amid surroundings of wealth and pomp and scenes palatial, waiting for his return. Every mother expects her son to be victorious, and this mother looked out at the window expecting to see him drive up in his chariot followed by wagons loaded with embroideries and also by regiments of men vanquished and enslaved. I see her now sitting at the window, in high expectation. She watches the furthest turn of the road. She looks for the flying dust of the swift hoofs. The first flash of the bit of the horses' bridle she will catch.

The ladies of her court stand round and she tells them of what they shall have when her son comes up,—chains of gold and carcanets of beauty and dresses of such wondrous fabric and splendor, as the Bible only hints at but leaves us to imagine. "He ought to be here by this time," says his mother, "that battle is surely over. I hope that freshet of the river Kishon has not impeded him. I hope those strange appearances we saw last night in the sky were not ominous, when the stars seemed to fight in their courses. No! No! he is so brave in battle I know he has won the day. He will soon be here." But alas for the disappointed mother: she will not see the glittering head-gear of the horses at full gallop bringing her son home from victorious battle. As a solitary messenger arriving in hot haste rides up to the window at which the mother of Sisera sits, he cries: "Your armies are defeated and your son is dead," there is a scene of horror and anguish from which we turn away.

Now you see the full meaning of my short text: "The mother of Sisera looked out at a window." Well, my friends, we are all out in the battle of life; it is raging now and the most of us have a mother watching and waiting for news of our victory or defeat. If she be not sitting at the window of earth she is sitting at a window of heaven, and she is going to hear all about it.

By all the rules of war Sisera ought to have been triumphant. He had nine hundred iron chariots and a host of many thousands vaster than the armies of Israel. But God was on the other side; and the angry freshets of Kishon and the hail, the lightning and the unmanageable war-horses and the capsized chariots and the stellar panic in the sky discomfited Sisera. Josephus in his history describes the scene in the following words: "When they were come to a close fight there came down from heaven a great storm with a vast quantity of rain and hail, and the wind blew the rain in the face of the Canaanites, and so darkened their eyes their arrows and slings were of no advantage to them, nor would the coldness of the air permit the soldiers to make use of their swords; while this storm did not so much incommode the Israelites because it came on their backs. They also took such courage upon the apprehension that God was assisting them that they fell upon the very midst of their enemies and slew a great number of them; so that some of them fell by the Israelites, some fell by their own horses which were put into disorder, and not a few were killed by their own chariots."

Hence, my hearers, the bad news brought to the mother of Sisera looking out at the window. And our mother, whether sitting at a window of earth or a window of heaven, will hear the news of our victory or defeat. Not according to our talents or educational equipment or our opportunities, but according as to whether God is for us or against us.

"Where's mother?" is the question most frequently asked in many households. It is asked by the husband as well as the child coming in at nightfall. "Where's mother?" "It is asked by the little ones when they get hurt and come in crying with the pain: "Where's mother?" It is asked by those who have seen some grand sight or heard some good news or received some beautiful gift: "Where's mother?" She sometimes feels wearied by the question, for they all ask it and keep asking it all the time. She is not only the first to hear every case of perplexity, but she is the judge in every court of domestic appeal. That is what puts the premature wrinkles on so many maternal faces, and powders white so many maternal foreheads. You see it is a question that keeps on for all the years of childhood. It comes from the nursery and from the evening stand where the boys and girls are learning their school lesson, and from the starting out in the morning, when the tippet or hat or slate or book or overshoe is lost, until at night all out of breath the youngsters come in and shout until you can hear them from cellar to garret, and from front door to the back fence of the back yard. "Where's mother?" Indeed a child's life is so full of that question that if he be taken away one of the things that the mother most misses and the silence that most oppresses her, is the absence of that question, which she will never hear on earth again, except she hears it in a dream which sometimes restores the nursery just as it was,

and then the voice comes back so natural, and so sweet, and so innocent, and so inquiring, that the dream breaks at the words, "Where's mother?"

If that question were put to most of us this morning, we would have to say, if we spoke truthfully, like Sisera's mother, she is at the palace window. She has become a queen unto God forever, and she is pulling back the rich folds of the King's upholstery to look down at us. We are not told the particulars about the residence of Sisera's mother, but there is in that scene in the Book of Judges so much about embroideries and needle-work and ladies in waiting, that we know her residence must have been princely and palatial. So we have no minute and particular description of the Palace at whose window our glorified mother sits, but there is so much in the closing chapters of the good old Book about crowns, and pearls big enough to make a gate out of one of them, new songs, and marriage suppers, and harps, and white horses with kings in the stirrups, and golden candle-sticks, that we know the heavenly residence of our mother is superb, is unique, is colonnaded, is domed, is embowered, is fountained, is glorified, beyond the power of pencil or pen or tongue to present, and in the window of that Palace the mother sits, watching for news from the battle. What a contrast between that celestial surrounding and her once earthly surroundings. What a work to bring up a family, in the old-time way, with but little or no hired help, except perhaps for the washing-day, or for the swine-slaughtering, commonly called "the killing-day." There was then no reading of elaborate treatises on the best modes of rearing children, and then leaving it all to hired help, with one or two visits a day to the nursery to see if the principles announced are being carried out. The most of those old folks did the sewing, the washing, the mending, the darning, the patching, the millinery, the mantua-making, the house-keeping, and in hurried harvest time helped spread the hay or tread down the load in the mow. They were at the same time caterers, tailors, doctors, chaplains and nurses for a whole household all together down with measles or scarlet fever, or round the house with whooping coughs and croups and run-round fingers and ear-aches, and all the infantile distempers which at some time swoop upon every large household. Some of those mothers never got rested in this world. Instead of the self-rocking cradles of our day, which, wound up, will go hour after hour for the solace of the young slumberer, it was weary foot on the rocker sometimes half the day or half the night—rock—rock—rock—rock. Instead of our drug stores filled with all the wonders of materia medica, and called up through a telephone, with them the only apothecary short of four miles' ride was the garret, with its bunches of peppermint and pennyroyal and catnip and mustard and camomile flowers, which were expected to do everything. Just think of it! Fifty years of preparing breakfast, dinner and supper. The chief music they heard was that of spinning-wheel and rocking-chair. Fagged out, head-achey, and with ankles swollen. Those old-fashioned mothers—if any persons ever fitted appropriately into a good easy comfortable heaven, they were the folks, and they got there and they are rested. They wear no spectacles, for they have their third sight—as they lived long enough on earth to get their second sight—and they do not have to pant for breath after going up the emerald stairs of the Eternal Palace, at whose window they now sit waiting for news from the battle.

But if anyone keeps on asking the question "Where's mother?" I answer, she is in your present character. The probability is that your physical features suggest her. If there be seven children in a household at least six of them look like their mother, and the older you get the more you will look like her. But I speak now especially of your character, and not of your looks. This is easily explained. During the first ten years of your life you were almost all the time with her, and your father you saw only mornings and nights. There are no years in any life so important for impression as the first ten. Then and there is the impression made for virtue or vice, for truth or falsehood, for bravery or cowardice, for religion or scepticism. Suddenly start out from behind a door and frighten the child and you may shatter his nervous system for a lifetime. During the first ten years you can tell him enough spook stories to make him a coward till he dies. Act before him as though Friday were an unlucky day, and it were baleful to have thirteen at the table, or see the moon over the left shoulder, and he will never recover from the idiotic superstitions. You may give that girl before she is ten years old a fondness for dress that will make her a mere "dummy frame," or fashion plate for forty years. Ezekiel 16: 44, "As is the mother so is her daughter." Before one decade has passed you can decide whether that boy shall be a Shylock or a George Peabody. Boys and girls are generally echoes of fathers and mothers. What an incoherent thing for a mother out of temper to punish a child for getting mad, or for a father who smokes to shut his boy up in a dark closet because he has found him with an old stump of a cigar in his mouth: or for that mother to rebuke her daughter for staring at herself too much in the looking-glass, when the mother has her own mirrors so arranged as to repeat her form from all sides. The great English poet's loose moral character was decided before he left the nursery, and his schoolmaster in the school room overheard this conversation: "Byron, your mother is a fool," and he answered, "I know it." You can hear through all the heroic life of Senator Sam Houston the words of his mother, when she in the war of 1812 put a musket in his hand and said: "There, my son, take this and never disgrace it, for remember I had rather all my sons should fill one honorable grave than that one of them should turn his back on an enemy. Go and remember, too, that while the door of my cottage is open to all brave men, it is always shut against cowards." Agrippina, the mother of Nero a murderess, you are not surprised that her son was a murderer. Give that child an over-dose of catechism, and make him recite verses of the Bible as a punishment, and make Sunday a bore, and he will become a stout antagonist of Christianity. Impress him with the kindness and the geniality and the loveliness of religion and he will be its advocate and exemplar for all time and eternity. A few days ago right before our express train on the Louisville & Nashville R. R. the preceding train had gone down through a broken bridge, twelve cars falling a hundred feet and then consumed, I saw that only one span of the bridge was down and all the other spans were standing. Plan a good bridge of morals, for your sons and daughters but have the first span of ten years defective and through that they will crash down, though all the rest keep standing. Oh man! Oh woman! if you have preserved your integrity and are really Christian, you have first of all to thank God, and I think next you have to thank your mother. The most impressive thing at the inauguration of James A. Garfield, as President of the United States, was that after he had taken the oath of office he turned round, and in the presence of the Supreme Court and the Senate of the United States, kissed his old mother. If I had time to take statistics out of this audience, and I could ask what proportion of you who are Christians owe your salvation under God to maternal fidelity, I think about three-fourths of you would spring to your feet. "Ha! ha!" said the soldiers of the regiment to Charlie one of their comrades, "What has made the change in you? You used to like sin as well as any of us." Pulling from his pocket his mother's letter in which, after telling of some comforts she had sent him, she concluded: "We are all praying for you Charlie that you may be a Christian," he said, "Boy's that's the sentence."

The trouble with Sisera's mother was that while sitting at the window of my text watching for news of her son from the battlefield, she had the two bad qualities of being dissolute and being too fond of personal adornment. The Bible account says: "Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she returned answer to herself: 'Have they not sped? Have they not divided the prey: to every man a damsel or two: to Sisera a prey of divers colors, a prey of divers colors of needlework, of divers colors of needlework on both sides?'" She makes no anxious utterance about the wounded in battle, about the bloodshed, about the dying, about the dead, about the principles involved in the battle going on: a battle so important that the stars and the freshets took part, and the clash of swords was answered by the thunder of the skies. What she thinks most of is the bright colors of the wardrobes to be captured, and the needlework. "To Sisera a prey of divers colors, a prey of divers colors of needlework, of divers colors of needlework on both sides."

Now neither Sisera's mother nor anyone else can say too much in eulogy of the needle. It has made more useful conquests than the sword. Pointed at one end, and with an eye at the other, whether of bone or ivory as in earliest time, or of bronze, as in Pliny's time, or of steel, as in modern times; whether laboriously fashioned as formerly by one hand, or as now, when a hundred workmen in a factory are employed to make the different parts of one needle. It is an instrument divinely ordered for the comfort, for the life, for the health, for the adornment of the human race. The eye of the needle hath seen more domestic comfort and more gladdened poverty, and more Christian service than any other eye. The modern sewing-machine has in no wise abolished the needle, but rather enthroned it. Thank God for the needlework, from the time when the Lord Almighty from the heavens ordered in regard to the embroidered door of the ancient Tabernacle: "Thou shalt make a hanging for the door of the tent of blue and purple and scarlet and fine-twined linen, wrought with needlework," down to the womanly hands which this winter in this Tabernacle are presenting for benevolent purposes their needlework. But there was nothing except vanity and worldliness and social splash in what Sisera's mother said about the needlework she expected her son would bring home from the battle. And I am not surprised to find that Sisera fought on the wrong side, when his mother at the window of my text, in that awful exigency had her chief thought on dry goods achievement and social display. God only knows how many homes have made shipwreck on the wardrobe. And that mother who sits at the window watching for vain-glorious triumph of millinery and fine colors, and domestic pageantry, will after a while hear as bad news from her children out in the battle of life, as Sisera's mother heard from the struggle at Esdraelon.

But if you still press the question "Where's mother?" I will tell you where she is not, though once she was there. Some of you started with her likeness in your face and her principles in your soul. But you have cast her out. That was an awful thing for you to do, but you have done it. That hard, grinding, dissipated look you never got from her. If you had seen anyone strike her you would have struck him down without much care whether the blow was just sufficient or fatal, but my boy you have struck her down—struck her innocence from your face and struck her principles from your soul. You struck her down! The tent-pin that Jael drove three times into the skull of Sisera was not so cruel as the stab you have made more than three times through your mother's heart. But she is waiting yet, for mothers are slow to give up their boys—waiting at some window, it may be a window on earth or at some window in heaven. All others may cast you off. Your wife may seek divorce and have no more patience with you. Your father may disinherit you and say, "Let him never again darken the door of our house." But there are two persons who do not give you up—God and mother.

How many disappointed mothers waiting at the window. Perhaps the panes of the window are not great glass plate, beveled, and hovered over by exquisite lambrquin, but the window is made of small panes, I would say about six or eight of them, in summer wreathed with trailing vine, and in winter pictured by the Raphaels of the frost, a real country window. The mother sits there knitting, or busy with her needle of homely repairs, when she looks up, and sees coming across the bridge of the meadow brook a stranger who dismounts in front of the window. He lifts and drops the heavy knocker of the farmhouse door. "Come in!" is the response. He gives his name, and says, "I have come on a sad errand." "There is nothing the matter of my son in the city, is there?" she asks. "Yes!" he says. "Your son got into an unfortunate encounter with a young man in a liquor saloon last night, and is badly hurt. The fact is he cannot get well. I hate to tell you all. I am sorry to say he is dead." "Dead!" she cries as she totters back. "Oh my son! my son! my son! Would God I had died for thee!" That is the ending of all her cares, and anxieties, and good counsels for that boy. That is her pay for her self-sacrifices in his behalf. That is the bad news from the battle. So the tidings of derelict or Christian sons travel to the windows of earth, or the windows of heaven at which mothers sit.

"But," says some one, "are you not mistaken about my glorified mother hearing of my evil doings since she went away." Says some one else: "Are you not mistaken about my glorified mother hearing of my self-sacrifice and moral bravery and struggle to do right?" No! heaven and earth are in constant communication. There are trains running every five minutes—Trains of immortals ascending and descending—Spirits going from earth to heaven to live there. Spirits descending from heaven to earth to minister and help. They hear from us many times every day. Do they hear good news or bad news from this battle, this Sedan, this Thermopylae, this Austeroitz, in which every one of us is fighting on the right side or the wrong side. Oh, God! whose I am, and whom I am trying to serve, as a result of this sermon, roll over on all mothers a new sense of their responsibility, and upon all children, whether still in the nursery or out on the tremendous Esdraelon of mid-life or old age, the fact that their victories or defeats sound clear out, clear up to the windows of sympathetic maternity. Oh, is not this the minute when the cloud of blessing filled with the exhaled tears of anxious mothers shall burst in showers of mercy on this audience!

There is one thought that is almost too tender for utterance. I almost fear to start it lest I have not enough control of my emotion to conclude it. As when we were children we so often came in from play or from a hurt or from some childish injustice practiced upon us, and as soon as the door was opened we cried: "Where's mother?" and she said: "Here I am," and we buried our weeping faces in her lap: so after a while when we get through with the pleasures and hurts of this life, we will, by the pardoning mercy of Christ, enter the Heavenly Home, and among the first questions, not the first but among the first, will be the old question that we used to ask, the question that is being asked in thousands of places at this very moment—the question: "Where's mother?" And it will not take long for us to find her or for her to find us, for she will have been watching at the window for our coming, and with the other children of our household of earth we will again gather round her, and she will say: "Well! how did you get through the battle of life? I have often heard from others about you: but now I want to hear it from your own souls. Tell me all about it, my children!" And then we will tell her of all our earthly experiences, the holidays, the marriages, the birth-hours, the burials, the heart-breaks, the losses, the gains, the victories, the defeats, and she will say, "Never mind, it is all over now. I see each one of you has a crown which was given you at the gate as you came through. Now cast it at the feet of the Christ who saved you and me and saved us all. Thank God we are never to part, and for all the ages of eternity you will never again have to ask, 'Where's mother?'"

"Poor Jack's" Own Mission.

The Seamen's Rescue in New York—Ocean Wanderers Brought to Christ.

AMONG the many Rescue Missions in New York, is one for seamen, under the auspices of the Seamen's Christian Association. The work began at No. 665 Washington street with limited means, but with strong faith that it was a good field. It continued quietly and unostentatiously, and has grown steadily, like the grain of mustard seed, until its usefulness has spread into all lands, for the converted seamen—bearing the glad tidings of Jesus' power to save—go into every clime and corner of the world.

The Mission-Room is comfortable and attractive. Seamen are seated around the tables reading, writing or chatting with one another. The number increases towards evening, until from thirty to forty are ready to take seats forward for the evening service, and as the praise-meeting begins, others appear and the room is frequently crowded with sailor boys and visitors, glad to avail themselves of this "rest by the way." The attendance varies, of course, according to the number of steamers in port; but in the aggregate is about 900 a month. Last month (December), it was 1,331, of whom nearly 800 seamen attended evening services. Of this number, a fair proportion signed the temperance pledge and several professed conversion.

It is inspiring to listen to the hearty singing by those wanderers of the deep, of the hymns: "Pull for the Shore," "Beneath Land," "A Shelter in the time of Storm," "Stand up, Stand up for Jesus," "Throw out the Life-Line," etc. Many a life-line has there been thrown out, and grasped by some poor struggling seaman in this mission house.

"I am so glad I ever came into this little mission," says one, "for it was here that I gave my heart to God six months ago, and I never was so happy in my life."

"I remember," follows another, "coming here when this mission was opened seven years ago: it was very different then: the only seats at first were pine boards placed upon boxes—now what a change! One of the ladies helped me to give up drink, and to lead a new life, and now I can always find time and place to pray to God, who keeps me day by day."

"When I came into this mission room some eight months ago, I had been drinking. You spoke a word that set me thinking. I threw my whiskey bottle into the street, and the next night helped me to clinch the matter, and I've been trying to do right, and have been kept ever since." And so they continue.

By the bedside of a seaman in hospital, we hear him whisper with tears in his eyes, "God bless you for coming to see me. You've made me forget all my pain. It was in your mission that I gave my heart to God. Yes, please come again if you have time, and would you write my wife and tell her?"

Many more encouraging instances might be given. "Hope," the motto of the mission, is indeed "an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast," and enables its workers to press on with renewed energy.

The officers of the mission are: President, Rev. Henry Wilson, D. D.; First Vice-President, Miss Mary B. Cookman; Second Vice-President, Mr. Hugh O'Neill; Secretary, Miss Emma M. Bangs.

In connection with the work, a Seamen's Hope Circle of the King's Daughters and Sons has been organized, its object being to supplement the work of the Seamen's Association. The ladies and missionary visit the steamers and invite the seamen personally to spend their leisure hours at the mission rooms, instead of in the liquor and gambling saloons. Their work is already producing an excellent effect and many rudderless lives have been set on the right track through the efforts of these godly and self-denying women.

Thus is the good seed sown, in trust that it will bear abundant fruitage in the great harvest of eternity.

Where Crusaders Worshipped.

by a wall but the latter was greatly dilapidated and even the gates had fallen to pieces. The Governor of Jerusalem, in preparing for the ceremony, had given orders for the repair of the wall, and new gates, fitted with locks and keys, were supplied, in order that, at the proper moment, he might be able to deliver the keys in the name of the Sultan, to the Imperial visitors. Baron von Alten, the German Consul at Jerusalem, had two olive wood tables placed within the enclosure and a flagstaff was set up on an immense pile of rubbish. At the hour fixed for the ceremony a considerable crowd gathered. When the Crown Prince arrived, he found the Governor of Jerusalem surrounded by Turkish dignitaries, awaiting him. The Governor opened and read the Sultan's firman and then formally tendered the keys to the Crown Prince, who, in a few well-chosen words, accepted them. "In the name of the king of Prussia," he said, "I take possession of this building and ruins, and the king of Prussia shall hold them." Then at the signal, "One, two, three!" Ferdinand Vester, whose portrait we also publish, started up the steps and with a hammer nailed the royal arms of Prussia firmly over the gate amid the acclamation of the assemblage.

Work was quickly begun with the view of clearing and improving the Muristan. The slaughtering-house was removed outside the city gates, and the rubbish was carted off by donkeys and deposited outside the Jaffa gate. In 1870, the greater part of the ancient Crusader structure was brought to light. One of the large halls of the cloister, on being excavated, was found to be in a fair state of preservation, and this the German residents utilized as a chapel.

At that time, the German Protestant colony in Jerusalem had no place of worship of their own. Baron von Alten some time afterward wrote to the king of Prussia, stating the circumstances and urging that some step might be taken to secure them a place for their services. William I was at Versailles, at the head of his victorious army, when he received the letter and he immediately telegraphed, placing the venerable Muristan at the service of the congregation for the purpose of giving them a chapel within the grounds, adding that he would pay the cost of the necessary renovation out of his own private means. This was done and up to the present time, the Germans in Jerusalem have worshipped in the reconstructed chapel.

Public attention in Germany having been directed to the matter, a fund of several million marks was raised for the purpose of building a cathedral on the Muristan. The necessary amount was secured, but for various reasons the work was delayed till now. Emperor William II, sent Archbishop Adler from Berlin last October, with instructions to take the necessary steps toward building a church on the old foundation of the Crusaders' structure and to have the new edifice designed after the original. Work was begun several months ago on the foundation. The new church will be strictly evangelical and will be in charge of Dr. Schlöchter, the present pastor of the German Colony. In front of the Muristan, the street has been greatly improved and is now known as William Street, in honor of the German Emperor. It is the finest thoroughfare in the city of Jerusalem.

GOD'S COVENANT WITH NOAH.

S.S. Lesson for Jan. 28. Gen. 9: 8-17. Golden Text, Gen. 9: 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD never abandoned his purpose in the creation of man. Adam and Eve had failed him, Abel's life had been cut short, Cain had become hardened and a reprobate; but even in the seed of Seth, who was born in Adam's likeness and not in God's, our heavenly Father had a people, "a remnant according to the election of grace." There was an Enoch who "walked with God," to whom God could, even in those early times, confide his first communication regarding the future coming of our Lord. When the light of Enoch's life shone no more on earth, God raised up another witness, Noah, who like Enoch "walked with God" or in a current exactly contrary to the popular opinion of his day. It was

An Age of Materialism;

"Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," was the order of Noah's day; these earthly things, "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage" absorbed men; they lived for nothing else, self-will reigned supreme; they ignored all accountability to God, and "took them wives of all which they chose," even those amongst them who were called the sons of God, who "called upon the name of the Lord," or called themselves by the name of the Lord! God had his witnesses, but men in Noah's time shut their eyes to the light as they do now, and God was reduced to the necessity of bringing matters to a crisis. It was an awful moment for that generation when it was determined in the counsels of the Most High: "My Spirit shall not always strive with man for that he also is flesh, yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years." Up to that time, God's Spirit had striven; Enoch and Noah were the fruits of his striving; now God would be no longer mocked; man would not have God, and God would cease to force himself upon man. Yet God was in no hurry to destroy; and one hundred and twenty years he waited in the awful dignity of his patient love, while the one only man in that generation gave time, and strength, and money to the preparation of the ark; a solid indisputable witness to the faith of Noah, in his constant declaration that God's judgments were coming upon the earth. It was only to a man whose real acquaintance with God was such that he could have had the courage to hold on his separate walk with God; willing to be misunderstood, despised, scourged—that God could confide his purposes or make known his covenant. To be great with man is at the price of living at a distance from God, to be in the secrets of the Lord is at the price of being "despised and rejected of men" as our Lord himself was. It must have been an awful revelation to Noah when God opened his heart to him, and let him see with his eyes the heart of man only evil continually and the earth corrupt before God,—"for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth"—and to carry in his own heart as a reality that which his generation refused to believe, that they, and the very earth they lived for, were daily approaching nearer to destruction! And then that he should so enter into the thoughts of his God that he could see there was no other way for the glory of God or for the redemption of the human race, but death.

Quietly and solemnly the work of preparation went on in the counsels of heaven and in the obedience of the man of faith on earth. At last all was ready, and while some were gathered at a banquet and some at a marriage feast, while they were saying: Peace and safety, sudden destruction came upon them unawares and they did not escape. So shall it be in the coming day of the Son of Man. Noah had prepared an ark to the saving of his house, and he, his wife, his three sons and their wives, rose nearer heaven with every wave of the mighty overflow of the fountains of the great deep, which swept the despairing, shrieking multitude to their awful, hopeless doom. And Noah, who knew the long suffering of God which had waited a hundred and twenty years, could not ask him to reverse his sentence, he said there was no other way. That generation would not be saved consistently with God's holiness, they must abide by their decision and perish! Oh the madness of men who persist in ignoring God! "The fool hath said in his heart: There is no God." "Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Noah's was indeed carried in the ark over the rivers of a buried earth to be the father of a generation of men upon a cleansed earth, he lived between the dead and the living, having no place to plant his foot upon the judged earth, and as yet no ground to stand upon in the new order of things. But in the will of his God, he found in the ark, with its only opening upward on the God side, a possibility of existence. Many who are looking for the coming of the Lord find themselves in a somewhat similar position, severed from the past crucified with Christ, the world knows them not; citizens of heaven their only window is above, from whence they look for a Saviour, yet in the will of God they are at rest. Altogether Noah was nearly a year in the ark without seeing either land or water; then he removed the covering of the ark, and saw that the earth was dry; but he waited for God's direction before he ventured forth with his strange ship's company, and the first thing he did on the cleansed earth was to take possession of it for God; he raised a memorial for God by building an altar and offering sacrifice. And this he did, not meanly, but of every clean beast and fowl Noah gave one in sacrifice. Tithes the tenth, were the order under the law, but not a tenth to the Lord. And the Lord smelled a sweet savor, and the Lord said in his heart: "I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake." And he renewed to Noah the blessing which he had pronounced upon Adam in his state of innocence, and added the gift of animal food, saying: "Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things." But from the beginning blood, which is the life of all flesh, was forbidden, and the righteous law of God, was instituted: "Surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made he man." The regicide, the homicide, the suicide, is guilty of sin against the image of God; it is sacrilege in the highest sense.

God having prepared the way, drew near to Noah; his original thought to unite man to himself still uppermost he spake unto Noah, and now to his sons with him, saying: "And I behold I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you." And God did not even stop at the sons of Noah but would draw near to him in covenant even the very animal world in the fulness of his grace and love. "I will establish my covenant with you," he said, "neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood." This is God's covenant with everything that breathes; whatever there may be, a repetition of the flood can never be, for God hath said it and bound himself by promise. In his heart he had already said, and some way communicated to man, "While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease." Terrible troubles shall come, but no second flood.

And God said: "This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you and every living creature that is with you for perpetual generations: I do set and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth." We read in (Rev. 4: 3) that there was a rainbow round about the throne, in sight like unto an emerald, and in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne were the four living creatures. As the four faces of the Cherubim make one living creature so the variegated colors of the rainbow make one circle of glory round about the throne.

My Bow in the Cloud,

MOUNT ARARAT.

THE significance of the verses, which form the subject of the lesson, consists in the fact that they describe the circumstances under which the human race was to have a new beginning in the world. The new era opens with a blessing and a promise. This family, represented as being commissioned to replenish the earth, is in a different situation from that of Adam and Eve. They are not in a garden, with a forbidden tree and a talking serpent, and not inexperienced and childlike; but having seen sin in awful culmination and having witnessed the retribution of an angry God. They might well be dismayed and apprehensive. God approaches them in blessing and with words of encouragement. Such a judgment is never to be visited on the world again and they are to be reminded of the promise whenever they see the bow in the cloud. We are not to suppose that there was never a rainbow before this, but that after this time it was to have a new meaning for them. The promise has been kept, but sin is still punished, although the punishment comes in other ways. It works thenceforward by natural laws. Not by fire or flood does God punish the sinner, but sin brings sorrow, poverty, disease and death. God is still true to his nature and man persists in wickedness. Even after a calamity so appalling as the deluge, there was no amendment. The next chapters are a record of immorality and unbelief. So it has been ever since. Punishment does not redeem. Christ himself said it would be so to the end; and that, when he comes the second time, the world will be in much the same condition that it was when Noah entered the ark (Matt. 24: 37-39) and then, as at the Deluge, God will deliver those who serve him.

There is testimony outside of the Bible of such a catastrophe as the Deluge having taken place. Traditions of a great flood have been found among the Persians, Hindus, Chinese and other Asiatic nations. They appear, too, in early Greek literature in the story of Deucalion and Pyrrha. Geo. Smith found it also, in a form closely resembling the Bible narrative, inscribed on the tablets in the Library of Ashurbanah, king of Assyria. That account represents Isdubar, his family and servants and flocks and herds being saved from a flood in a ship, which he had been instructed to build of wood and line with pitch. From its window, after the ship was aground, Isdubar sends out a raven, a dove and a swallow, and finally emerges himself, and finds that all the human race have been drowned. But there is this radical difference between the two accounts, that while the Assyrian represents the catastrophe as the result of a quarrel among the gods, the Bible, true to its ethical purpose, describes it as God's punishment of a wicked world. There are no means of ascertaining the approximate date of the Deluge. The standard chronology sets it 1656 years after the Creation, but the whole system is manifestly unreliable. The scene, according to general belief, was in the Euphrates basin, and Hugh Miller, the great geologist, had a theory that it was caused by a subsidence of the land, which permitted the waters of the Persian Gulf, the Black Sea and the Mediterranean to inundate the country. In confirmation of his theory, he pointed to the fact that the Dead Sea is still 1,300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean.

With you and your seed after you. The covenant of love and care which God made with Noah is for perpetual generations. There is a beautiful story in Greek mythology which shows how the idea of a covenant between heaven and earth has been treasured by men. It tells that the lady Leto wandered in fear and sorrow, for no city or country would give her a home where she might abide in peace. From Crete to Athens, from Athens to Aegina, from Aegina to the heights of Pelion and Athos, she passed seeking a home. But in vain she prayed each land to receive her, until she came to the island of Delos and promised to raise it to great glory if only she might rest there in peace. And she lifted up her voice and said, "Listen to me, island of the dark sea, if thou wilt grant me a home, all nations shall come unto thee and great wealth shall flow in upon thee, for here shall Phœbus Apollo, the lord of life and light, be born, and men shall come here to know his will and win his favor." Then answered Delos and said: "Lady, thou promistest great things; but Apollo, I fear will despise my hard and barren land, and go to some other country where he will build a more glorious temple and grant richer gifts to the people who come to worship him." But Leto swore by the dark water of Styx and the wide heaven above, and the broad earth around her that Delos should be the shrine of Phœbus, and that there should the rich offerings burn on his altar the whole year round. So Leto rested in the Island of Delos and there was Phœbus Apollo born. Then was his temple built in Delos and men came to it from all lands to learn his will and offer sacrifice on his altar.

A token of a covenant. The rainbow was to be a reminder to men of God's promise. We might see many such reminders of God's love and protection if our eyes were open to them. Mungo Park tells us that when alone in the heart of Africa he was deeply affected by the sight of a flower. He says: "Whichever way I turned, nothing appeared but danger and difficulty. I saw myself in the midst of a vast wilderness in the depth of the rainy season naked and alone, surrounded by savage animals and still more savage men. I was five hundred miles from any white man's settlement. All these circumstances crowded at once on my recollection, and I confess that my spirits began to fail me. I considered my fate as certain, and that I had no alternative than to lie down and perish. At this moment, painful as my reflections were, the extraordinary beauty of a small moss in fruticulation irresistibly caught my eye. I mention this to show from what trifling circumstances the mind sometimes derives consolation; for, though the whole plant was not larger than the top of one of my fingers, I could not contemplate the delicate conformation of its leaves, and capsula without admiration. Can that Being, thought I, who planted and watered, and brought to perfection, in this obscure part of the world, a thing which appears of so small importance, look with unconcern upon the situation and sufferings of creatures formed after his own image? Surely not. Reflections like these would not allow me to despair. I started up, and, disregarding both hunger and fatigue, travelled forwards, assured that relief was at hand; and I was not disappointed."

The bow in the cloud. When Jeremy Taylor had lost all—when his house had been plundered, and his family driven out of doors, and all his worldly estate sequestered—he could still write thus: "I am taken into the hands of publicans and sequestrators, and they have taken all from me. What now? Let me look about me. They have left me the sun and moon, a loving wife and many friends to pity me, and some to relieve me; and I can still discourse, and, unless I list, they have not taken away my merry countenance and my cheerful spirit, and a good conscience; they have still left me the providence of God, and all the promises of the Gospel, and my religion, and my hopes of heaven, and my charity to them, too; and still I sleep and digest, I eat and drink, I read and meditate. And he that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness, who loves all these pleasures, and chooses to sit upon his little handful of thorns."

"I'VE BEEN REDEEMED!"

Macedonian cry came over the hill to me from the pastor of a church in a neighboring valley, and in response to that call a company of us drove over there one evening, with the understanding that they were to get me back in time to take the midnight train for New York. Never did the moon flood the earth with more silvery beams, nor the stars shine with greater brightness, than they did that night. Cloud and gloom were out of sight, while light and gladness were to be seen everywhere. God was around us, over us, beneath us and within us, and it was an easy matter to tell redemption's story to the company that filled that church in the valley. The moon and the stars sang without, and the people sang within the sacred edifice, until all realized that the God of Jacob was with his people. At last a man arose, and, with tears streaming down his cheeks, said: "You all know me; I'm a man now, but you knew me when I was a slave; I was a slave to the bottle, to habits, to sin; chains bound my brain, my body, my soul, but, thank God, I'm a slave no longer, for I've been redeemed, and to God be all the glory for making a man out of a slave."

Yes, they all knew him, and when he sat down, how the old church rang with the song,

I've been redeemed, I've been redeemed,
Been washed in the blood of the Lamb.

The meeting closed and we were soon climbing the hill on our homeward journey, and making the welkin ring with songs of praise. Ever and anon, we came back to the refrain, "I've been redeemed," and as we reached the hilltop the song rolled out and up, until the melody seemed to float on the moonbeams, rustle in the tree-tops, and sparkle in the starlight. The echoes from hilltop and valley, from rocks and woods, with melodious voice sent back the chorus, "I've been redeemed." My friends escorted me to the depot, and as the train moved out, I stood on the rear platform of the last car and they on the platform of the station, and the last we heard from each other was the song, "I've been redeemed."

An old friend stood at the throttle-valve on the engine that night, and somehow he seemed to know the song that was in my heart, and on my lips, and a part of my dreams, as I lay in my berth, for the swing of the car and the roll of the train beat perfect time to the glad chorus, "I've been redeemed." A comfortable night's sleep, sweetened with musical dreams, was followed by a good breakfast in the morning, and I settled back in my seat to continue my journey and think over the experience given in the Valley Church the night before by that ex-slave of sin. As I thought, my heart grew warm within me; the tears coursed down my cheeks, and soon, forgetful of my surroundings, I broke out singing:

O, for a thousand tongues to sing,
My great Redeemer's praise;
The glory of my God and King,
The triumphs of his grace.

I've been redeemed! I've been redeemed!
Been washed in the blood of the Lamb.

As I came to the chorus, a gentleman seated just behind me, with a rich, full voice, added a good bass to my soprano, and as I turned to look at him, I found his face all aglow, and he quickly leaned forward and grasped my hand.

"You have a grand bass voice," I said, "and you sing gloriously, but have you been redeemed?"

"Indeed, I have," was his reply.

"I am glad of that, but when did it happen?"

"Over eighteen hundred years ago."

"Over eighteen hundred years ago!" I exclaimed, "why I should never take you to be as old as that."

"Well, I'm not," he laughingly replied: "that's when it happened; but I only found it out about nineteen years ago, but I'm so glad I found it out."

"Then it's one thing to be redeemed and another thing to find it out, is it?"

"Yes, it is," was the reply; "let us sing some more."

We sang on and soon other voices joined in the chorus, and there was no happier singer in the company than the colored porter. But in a seat not far off sat a man who didn't sing, and who looked as if something hurt him, and hurt him bad. He scowled at us and he grunted at us, and we soon discovered that he had a savage breast that all our music could not soothe. But no matter; out swelled the song, and in the midst of it the door opened and in came the conductor. Our scowling, growling neighbor at once jumped to his feet, and with an oath he exclaimed: "Conductor, I wish you would put a stop to that nonsense."

I knew what the smile on the conductor's face meant, for a truer Christian in the church or on the cars could not be found anywhere. He came over to me, clasped my hand, and, calling me by name, he said:

"That song sounds glorious, but I noticed you were a little weak in the tenor; let us have another verse, and I will try and supply what is lacking."

Again the song of redemption filled the car; eighteen of the company sang:

I've been redeemed, I've been redeemed,
Been washed in the blood of the Lamb, and ere we parted that morning we found that all had been redeemed, and fourteen of us had found it out. C. H. MEAD.

ANCIENT PHENICIAN WRITINGS.

Recent investigation has brought to light very important indications as to the early civilization of Palestine by means of clay tablets. It is well-known to scholars that Thothmes III., when he defeated the league of Hittites and Phenicians at Megiddo, in 1600 B. C. (a century before Amenophis III., acceded), reaped a spoil which indicates the advanced civilization of Syria, including not only the precious metals and chariots painted and plated, but also objects of art having a high æsthetic value, and that he found corn, wine and oil abundant in the country, and many hundred walled towns, in which there were already temples of the gods.

Such evidence has, however, been slighted by those who seem to regard the early Hebrews as semi-savages, and who think that, though placed in the very centre of the ancient civilized world, between the Egyptians and the Assyrians, they were, nevertheless, unacquainted with any arts and un-influenced by surrounding culture. The new discoveries insist on quite another understanding of the ancient history. We find that not only in Egypt or in Mesopotamia was the art of writing known in the time of Moses, but that the inhabitants of Palestine also could pen a brick epistle which in the space of a few inches, contained as much information as can now be condensed into a sheet of note paper. Such letters were neither heavy nor bulky, and could be carried in the turban or in the folds of the shirt bosom, just as easily as paper letters are now so carried, with the additional advantage that they were imperishable, as is witnessed by the fact that they are now being read, 3,400 years after they were written. It is quite clear that the Hebrew civilization was not inferior to its surroundings.

GAPS IN THE BIBLE.

References are made in the books of Samuel and the Kings to some contemporary records which were evidently of a much fuller and more detailed character than those we have. Those archives of the two kingdoms are lost to us, but we are now enabled to fill many of these gaps with information derived from the Library of Ashurbanabal, king of Assyria, which was discovered in the mounds in the deserts of Mesopotamia. An article by Morris Jastrow, Jr., in the current number of the "Century," shows how valuable to the Bible student are the works of that ancient royal library. The mounds on the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates were long regarded with curiosity, but no one imagined that they contained so rich a treasure. They proved, on being opened, to be ruined palaces and public buildings which were buried under the sand that the winds of centuries had blown over them. When this sand was cleared away the excavators were astounded at the evidences of culture and high civilization which were revealed. But not then, and not for several years afterward, did they realize the value of their discovery. In one building they found many thousands of tablets of baked clay which had been written on before baking. The writing was singularly beautiful, but in an unknown character. These are being deciphered by scholars in Germany, England and France, and the work is still far from complete. From these tablets it is found that they constituted a national library collected by Ashurbanabal for the benefit of his subjects. What makes them still more valuable is that a large number bear the statement that they are copies of works even then ancient, which had been made by the king's order, that his library might be complete. We thus have works which were considered ancient in the days of Ashurbanabal, who was the grandson of Sennacherib and died before Nebuchadnezzar was born. The tablets are numbered, and each bears the inscription that it is "The property of Ashurbanabal, the king of hosts and the king of Assyria." They are from six to ten inches square and some are larger still. They were ranged carefully on shelves around the walls of the Library, which had apparently been a building several stories high. Two floors have already been cleared and a third has been found. In the corners of the Library large clay cylinders like huge barrels were set, which were inscribed with the national records of military campaigns, conquests and great internal achievements such as the erection of temples and public buildings. By piecing together these records, so strangely found, with the books of Kings and Chronicles, we obtain a clear view of the situation and many details of the lives of Hezekiah, Hoshea and Manasseh not mentioned in the Bible. Thus the writer of Kings disposes of the Northern Kingdom of Israel in three verses (II. Kings 18:9-11), while a whole series of tablets is devoted to a description of the campaign. The ancient reprints—as we should call them—are also deeply interesting, as they contain the legends of the Creation and the Deluge, strongly resembling the Bible account.

Preacher, Singer, Writer.

The Gospel Career of Rev. C. H. Mead, Our Brilliant Contributor—His Rare Delineations of Life Among the Lowly.

FEW men have worked more energetically with voice and pen in the cause of Christ, than Rev. C. H. Mead, our well-known contributor, whose portrait appears on this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Our readers are familiar with his delightful stories of evangelistic experience, illustrating in a peculiarly felicitous way, the influence of Gospel truths on the affairs of everyday existence. They have read with enjoyment his inimitable sketches entitled: "Show your Colors," "Monuments," "His Royal Highness," "Grumblers," "Uncle Ben," "The Song and the Star," and many others which have appeared in these columns. They recall with equal pleasure, his experience in the Southern evangelistic field, where he was the first of American home missionary workers to utilize the mails as a direct means of Gospel teaching. His sweet songs, his bright narratives of actual incidents in the course of a long career, his rich humor and touching pathos are among the things that have become very dear to our friends who have read his contributions during the past year.

Mr. Mead was born in New York City in 1841. For a number of years, he has resided in the western part of the state, his home at present being at Hornellsville. For years he was engaged successfully in evangelistic work, but of late years has been more closely identified with the temperance reform. He spent several winters in the South as the special missionary of the National Temperance Society, devoting his labors largely to the colored people, and his success in that work was phenomenal. He was the originator of the Silver Lake Temperance Assembly, and the organizer of the Silver Lake Quartette, of which he is still the leader. He is one of the busiest men in the country with head, voice, and pen. He is a popular preacher, and one of the leading speakers on the temperance platform. He is a great student of human nature, and is continually gleaning in out-of-the-way places for peculiar types of humanity. He looks on the bright side of things, and his laughter and tears lie close together. His pen is ever going at the desk, on the platform, or in the railroad train, and the sketches we publish from time to time from his pen are snatched from his busy, every-day life.

SLAVERY IN THE PACIFIC ISLANDS.

A strong protest is needed from the civilized Christian world against the Kanaka labor traffic or system of slavery now going on in the South Sea Islands, on account of its cruel oppression, bloodshed and murders. It is a disgrace to humanity, for which retributive justice has a fearful reckoning in store for all engaged in it. Whether to planters and employers in the pearl shell fisheries, or to English, French, German and American plantations, or to South and Central America, this traffic has carried away and laid in their grave many Kanakas—some ten thousand or more in Queensland, and many thousands elsewhere. A note to an official report giving these figures, says that the report is very imperfect, because many died in war that were not recorded. From the New Hebrides alone some seventy thousand of the young men and women have been taken away by this traffic, which is rapidly depopulating the islands. Other groups have suffered severely, even worse, where there are no missionaries to intimidate the traders and expose their atrocities: for the Kanaka labor traffic has feared the missionaries' exposure of its atrocities, and therefore the people are treated more kindly and justly on those islands which missionaries occupy. Several American papers tell their readers that certain slave vessels are now being prepared to go to the South Sea Islands in quest of laborers; also that not long ago one vessel took six hundred Kanakas away, and that they were disposed of somewhere in the South American districts. Another cargo of three hundred and fifty was wrecked and all were lost. Some sixteen vessels—two of them steamers—have for years been constantly engaged in this traffic, prowling about the islands, kidnapping and getting the islanders away by every deception that man can invent, and taking them away to the pearl shell fisheries and plantations. If this trade goes on for a very little while longer, these islands will be depopulated.

FERTILIZING CRYSTALS.

MAY God give us plenty of snow this season! Great snowstorms are the avant couriers of great crops, and I predict that the summer of 1864, will, in grains and fruits, eclipse many of its predecessors, if we can this winter have abundance of snow. So God treasures on mountain tops in natural reservoirs refreshment for the great valleys. What would the earth do if the piled up snowbanks on Mount Washington and the Adirondacks and the Sierra Nevadas in the summer months did not melt into the plains? The life of the continent depends on these influences. The great national banks on which July and August draw their checks are snowbanks, and though there is a run on them every summer, they never suspend payment. Welcome these flocculent masses of crystal! No wonder that Scoresby and Buchanan and Glaisher gave so much of their lives to study them, falling as they do in stars and wheels and prisms and pyramids and diamonds and in all the wondrous shapes of crystallography. The hunter to-morrow morning on the snow, following the rabbit track, will crush more wonders of architecture under his feet than can be seen in all the Alhambras and Parthenons and St. Mark's Cathedrals of the world. Even the Bible, though most of it was written in tropical climes, and where these frozen vapors are rarely seen, glorifies these white teathers of the wintry cloud. Job talks about washing his hands in snow water, and cries out: "Who can understand the treasures of the snow?" And David speaks of "snow like wool." Samuel describes a hero, who "slew a lion in time of snow." And Solomon declares that the "provident housewife is not afraid of the snow." And Isaiah says that scarlet sins become as "white as snow," and Jeremiah writes of the snow of Lebanon, and Matthew, describing the angel that rolled the stone from the door of the sepulchre, says: "His raiment was as snow," and St. John, speaking of the eternity of Christ, declares, "His hairs were white as snow." Thank God for the snow! Beautiful in poetry and prose, as well as necessary in fertilization! With the inconveniences it causes we can afford to be patient when it means the goodness and kindness and bounty of a gracious God. Moreover, I rejoice in it because it provides such splendid opportunity for juvenile sport, although city authorities have so interfered with it because there have been accidents. Such sports need regulation, but not suppression. Considering the fact that at such times all the boys in America who can get a sled—whether gilded and from the hardware store, or two hickory withes bound back and extremities frantically fastened—are riding down hill, there are fewer accidents than might have been expected.

There are dangers attached to all recreations—velocipedes, bicycles, garden swings, horseback riding, ball playing, pitching quoits, gymnastics. If we prohibit all things that have dangers attached, we would stop all pleasures and activities. It is dangerous for you to eat; you might choke. It is dangerous for you to walk down the street, for, slipping on an orange peeling, you might injure your spine. It is dangerous for you to breathe, for you might inhale malaria. By all means, let city authorities regulate coasting, and steer it clear of telegraph poles and foot passengers, but enact no city ordinance against the outbreak of healthful human nature. I am every day glad that I am not a boy now. There is nothing for him to do. What is to become of a bounding, robust boyish nature in our cities? Plenty of opportunities for sinful entertainment, but of harmless fun a complete bankruptcy. And all parents, intelligent parents, know the truth of what I say. He cannot ride down hill; it is against the law. He cannot snowball; it is against the law. He cannot set off a pack of firecrackers to celebrate the birth of American independence; it is against the law. I am glad that I live near a hill, where either by a special permission coasting is allowed or the police look the other way. Within sight of my window right after a fall of snow the procession of sleds flying down the hill and crawling up—for what genuine boy would not walk up to ride down?—the shout of demonstrative glee, the clear sweep of fun that imperils neither life nor limb, have been something for all good men and women to smile over and rejoice in. That is the way our youth are to get muscle and nerve and exuberance for the work they will be called to do, when they arrive amid the thirties and the forties and the fifties of earnest life. Multiply all the facilities for innocent sport. The way to crowd out bad amusements is to increase innocent amusements. When your boy is dead, if that overwhelming grief should ever strike your soul, you will feel more satisfaction in thinking of what pleasures you gave him than what unnecessary self-denials you inflicted upon him.

ANTE-MORTEM CHARITY.

IT is a very wise thing for a man to become his own executor. How much more beautiful is ante-mortem charity than post-mortem benevolence. There is many a man who has kept his money as long as he could keep it, and then when he had to die, he has made some charitable institution a legatee. Many a man has kept his money as long as he could keep it, and then when death met him, said: "Well, if I must I must, and now, Bible Society, you take so many thousands, and, reformatory institution, you take so many thousands." The fact is, if that man had four or five stout pockets in his shroud, he would have taken all his wealth with him. Better late than never to be charitable, but greater will be the reward of that man who gives to charitable institutions while he has the power to retain what he is giving away.

The Sabbath-school teacher builds her monument in the heavenly thrones and palaces of her converted class. George Muller of England, builds his monument in the orphan-houses of Bristol. George Peabody builds his monument in the library of his native village and the school-houses for educating the blacks in different parts of the South. Handel built his monument in the "Hallelujah Chorus." Cyrus W. Field has built his monument in the cables underlying the sea, lashing the continents together and hastening on the day of universal brotherhood. He who prays or gives for a church of Jesus Christ builds his monument in all that sacred edifice shall accomplish for good. Wilberforce built his monument in the piled-up shackles of a demolished slave trade. Livingstone built his monument in what shall be regenerated Africa. Paul built his monument in the magnificent story of the resurrection. William E. Dodge built his monument in the reformatory institutions he either established or helped to support. Peter Cooper built his monument in the philanthropies he encouraged by the establishment of that one institution for the education of the masses.

Ah! that is fame worth having—that is an immortality you can strive after without the degradation of worldly ambition. Let such monuments be built all the lands over until every crippled limb is straightened and every inebriate learns the luxury of cold water, and every outcast is brought home to his God, and the last crime is extirpated, and Paradise Lost becomes Paradise Regained.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

In reply to numerous inquiries, it is proper to state that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Premium Offers, consisting of "From Manger to Throne," the International Teachers' Bible, in Ruby type, and International Teachers' Bible, in Emerald type, are still open, though of course we cannot promise that this will be the case for any great length of time.

F. M. Waller, Williamsburg, Pa.: Was John the Baptist Elias? In Matt. 11: 14 Jesus says that he was, and in John 1: 21 John says he was not.

John the Baptist was he who was to come in the spirit and power of Elijah, as Luke states it (Luke 1: 17). The character of the Baptist and his life and preaching resembled those of Elijah. In the reply of the Baptist to the Jewish questioners, he doubtless had in mind the literalness which was their stumbling block, as it is of Christians at this day. They expected Elijah in person, taking the prophecy (Mal. 4: 5) literally, and John truthfully answered that he was not Elijah. Jesus, referring to the prophecy, said (Matt. 11: 14) that it was fulfilled in John. There is therefore no inconsistency.

S. Childers, Pesotum, Ill. What does the Apostle mean in Colossians 2: 12, by being buried with Christ in baptism?

Paul finds a spiritual parallel or antetype in the believer for the events of Christ's life. The idea occurs frequently in his epistles. He speaks of being dead with Christ (Rom. 6: 8), and being raised with him (Eph. 2: 6). The image in this case is the transition when the believer by a solemn act declares himself a Christian. Henceforth he should be dead to the world, and his future should be a resurrection life, new from that hour.

Frederick McKenzie, Lake Linden, Mich. Is it possible for one who has been converted by the Holy Spirit to be eternally lost?

We think the experiment has never been made. We cannot imagine one who has been really converted making such an appalling test. If really united to Christ by a living faith, there is such strengthening and protecting power in Christ's love, that his loved one is not likely to go beyond its reach, but will, if he wanders, be drawn back by that love or so chastened and scourged by divine providence that he will return. No converted person would try to ascertain at his own soul's risk whether there were bounds to Christ's love and forbearance.

Prescott Colby, Henniker, N. H., sends the following:

The HERALD and the premium
Are both a household treasure!
And thanks to you, that they have come,
They give us so much pleasure.
It came to us superbly neat,
Which showed good business packing.
And, as you said, it is complete,
And there is nothing lacking.
May Heaven bless your enterprise!
To every HERALD reader:
For we regard it as a prize—
God bless its able leader!

Lula Taylor, Pierson, Ia. I wish to join the Church. Many people talk so hard against them, I would like your opinion.

You should unite with any Christian denomination to which your inclinations lead you, and you can then readily find out whether the spiritual association is a congenial one. The church to which you refer is one of the greatest and most effective spiritual agencies on this continent. Even if this were not the case, we would give the same advice: any Christian denomination will help you; any such connection is preferable to remaining outside the pale of Christian fellowship.

C. M. G., Richard City, Wis. 1. It is possible for a Freemason to be a consistent Christian? 2. Would it be right for a Christian young lady to marry a Freemason?

1. As the editor of this journal is not a Freemason and as the proceedings of the lodges are kept secret, it is impossible for him as an outsider to tell you positively whether there is any inconsistency. You may, however, draw an inference from the fact that eminent Christians have been Freemasons. At the present time there are many clergymen, not only Freemasons, but officers of lodges, and they appear to have no conscientious scruples in performing their duties in the lodge and in the pulpit. It would appear therefore that they do not find their duties antagonistic or they would abandon Masonry. 2. If he is a Christian and she loves him, his being a Freemason we should think would not keep them apart.

Subscriber, Dennison, O. What would you do with the ad hoc clerical class of church members who love the ball and card parties far more than their church or its services, and upon whose pastoral counsel has no effect, but is rather listened to with indignation?

If your church has a Book of Discipline, the rules relating to such cases can be properly applied. It is within the power of the pastor and elders jointly, to suspend members who persistently offend, but this is a resort that should only be applied after all efforts at convincing the offenders of the error of their ways have failed. Inconsistent members are a source of weakness rather than of strength in a church and it is better to have a church with a smaller number of members—all earnest, true men and women—than a church many of whose members are leading a life at variance with their Christian professions.

J. L. Martin, Atlanta, Ga.: Do you manufacture the Teachers' Bibles which you send out as premiums with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD?

No; all our Teachers' Bibles are manufactured in England and Scotland.

Lemuel Fairchild, Providence, R. I. Was your statement in the MAIL-BAG regarding the journey from Alexandria to Cairo quite correct? You said the distance between Cairo and Ismailia was travelled by sea.

We should have said by rail instead. The remainder of the paragraph is accurate as printed.

G. Merrill, Frankville, Iowa. Is it right for a person to join a church who does not believe in the creed or rules of the church?

If the difference as to creed is so slight as not to interfere with fellowship, it is right to join. Persons who love the Lord Jesus Christ may unite in celebrating his dying love, in his appointed way, even if they differ on some doctrinal points. No one, however, should join a church if he is not prepared to obey its rules.

Subscriber, Elysia, O.: Does Christ command us to hate our relations in Luke 14: 26?

Not in the ordinary sense of the word. He was speaking to people who would have to encounter the opposition of their families in following him. He used a strong expression to signify the unswerving fealty he required. They could not please them and follow him at the same time. No one could be his disciple without breaking completely with all that kept them back from him.

G. C., Anderson, Ind.: Is there not a contradiction between 1 Kings 8: 26 and 1 Chron. 22: 2 as to the age of Abiah at the beginning of his reign? Which is right?

There is in our version. It is probably due to the error of some early copyist. The statement in Kings is correct. The Hebrews used letters for numbers, and the letter for twenty is so like that for forty that one is easily mistaken for the other. The error would probably have been set right by the Revisers if the zeal for the letter of the Bible had not been so strong.

S. M., Humeston, Iowa: What kind of an organization is the Baptist Union, from which Pastor Spurgeon withdrew?

A union of Baptist Churches for co-operation in home and foreign missionary work, for mutual aid and consultation. Its object is fellowship, and it has no legislative power or authority. Mr. Spurgeon found that his brethren differed from him so radically on the question of verbal inspiration and other doctrines that he felt he could no longer work with them harmoniously, and he therefore withdrew, but was a Baptist minister in good standing to the day of his death.

Constant Reader, Jersey City, N. J.: In writing your answer to "Reader," Topeka, Kan., in your issue of January 3, did you not overlook the statement in Gen. 5: 4 that Adam begat sons and daughters?

No; the statement appears to refer to births after that of Seth, and consequently does not give any light on the question of where Cain found his wife. By Genesis 4: 25 you will see that Seth was not born until after the murder of Abel. Nevertheless, as we said, the only inference that the believer in the historical accuracy of the Bible can accept from the narrative is that Adam and Eve had daughters of marriageable age at the time Cain married, and that he married one of them.

Mrs. W. R. Fulghum, Modoc, Ga. 1. An old gentleman, who is now visiting us, when I showed him your book From Manger to Throne, said the pictures could not be true as the first picture-taking ever invented was in 1792. Is it possible that pictures taken to-day, can represent things as they were 1700 years ago? 2. What did Peter have reference to when he said that "one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day?"

1. Your guest probably referred to the fact that photography was invented about that date, the first experiments that led to the discovery of the "photographic action" of the sun's rays on certain chemicalized surfaces, having been made by Scheele, a Swedish chemist between 1790 and 1800. Painting, however, is as old as history and representations of actual scenes and localities in ancient times are found in the form of painting and sculpture in many places of the world to-day, including China, Japan, India, Syria and Egypt. The photographs in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premium book "From Manger to Throne" are in every case accurate and authentic representations of the places as they are to-day, after the lapse of centuries. Many of the scenes and engravings other than photographs are taken from the most ancient paintings and sculptures, some of them older than the Christian era. 2. Peter's language was addressed to a people who were impatient for the fulfillment of certain prophecies and was intended to show that man's apprehension or measurement of time could not gauge the standard of the Almighty. The utterance has been adopted by many students of prophecy as indicating a standard upon which to base their calculations.

DEATH OF THE "WHITE PASHA."

RECENT cable dispatches bring the news of the death of Sir Samuel White Baker, the famous explorer of Central Africa. He was one of the earliest explorers to follow the discoveries of Livingstone and to penetrate farther into the unknown regions of the Dark Continent. Baker was forty years old when he started on his first journey into the interior. He was an Englishman by birth, but had been educated in Germany. From boyhood he had been deeply interested in travel and exploration, and had won some distinction and wealth when comparatively a young man, by organizing and settling an extensive colony in Ceylon. He lived there until the death of his first wife and then sought relief from sorrow in travel in many lands. In 1861, he set out, at his own expense, to discover the sources of the Nile. His second wife, a daughter of Finnan von Sass, whom he married at Cairo accompanied him. On his journey he met Speke and Grant who told him that they had heard of a great lake which they had been unable to visit. Baker pushed forward, discovered the lake and named it Albert Nyanza. After sailing on it for many miles he returned and, writing from Khartoum, he announced that the mystery of the Nile was solved. He had been three years on his journey and he declared himself worn out with difficulties, fatigue and fever. He was knighted by his queen, made Pasha by the Sultan and honored by several Universities and learned societies. He was subsequently placed by the Khedive of Egypt in command of an expedition to suppress the slave trade. Two thousand men were put under his orders, and two steamers and an abundance of supplies were furnished to him. The expedition cost two million dollars and over a thousand lives. After four years of continuous travel and almost constant fighting "The White Pasha" as Sir Samuel Baker was called, believed he had broken up the slave trade; but after his return, he was chagrined to hear that it had revived with its old power. His life since then has been spent in retirement from which he has emerged occasionally to publish some new book on Africa, the fruit of patient labor, in which Lady Baker rendered valuable assistance. It is as an explorer that Baker will chiefly be remembered. The great expedition from which he expected the greatest results, as a civilizing agency, was a disappointment. He found, as so many others have done in past ages, that such a result, is to be achieved "not by might or power," but by the Holy Spirit. (Zech 4:6.)

To Yield or Die.

A Mexican gentleman, now in St. Louis, describes in the "Globe-Democrat" an extraordinary self-imposed ordeal adopted by two lovers in Mexico. The parents of the girl were opposed to the marriage, as her lover was an American and they were anxious that she should marry a wealthy Mexican gentleman of their acquaintance. The girl resisted her lover's efforts to induce her to marry him without the consent of her parents, but declared her unalterable fidelity to him. After a long and fruitless endeavor to win the approval of the parents, the lovers abandoned themselves to despair. They came to the strangest agreement ever heard of. They determined to test their love by the agonies of a slow death. They shut themselves in a room, where the table was laden with food, and fruit. In this room they resolved to die of starvation. If either of them yielded to the craving of nature and partook of food the door was to be opened and both were to be free and were to part forever, neither to look on the other's face, again. They remained in the room for twelve days and neither of them wavered or murmured. Neither had touched the food or had wished to touch it, although both suffered torture from the pangs of hunger and were so weak they could scarcely stand. During their seclusion the girl's parents had made a thorough search for her and at the end of the twelfth day, her father succeeded in locating her and broke in the door of the room. It took them several days to recover from the counterfeit and a genuine note are laid side by side, even experts are puzzled as to which is the counterfeit. The execution of the portrait and lettering are so exquisite that the treasury officials say, a man capable of such work could easily make more money honestly than he can do by this dishonest occupation. His conduct is a remarkable instance of a shortsighted perversity which in a less degree is quite common. In the end it will be found that every man who prostitutes his talents in the service of sin would have done better for himself had he used them in the service of God. (1 Tim. 4:8.)

An Unappreciated Privilege.

The objections of a farmer to an offer made to him by a family in the city, are described in a Boston journal. The farmer's son was going to work in the city and application was made by the lad's mother to a family residing there, who had formerly been neighbors of their's in the country, to take him as a boarder. They consented; and the old lady joyously informed her husband, when he came in from his work, of the cordiality of the reply. "They have promised," she said, "to treat him as one of the family." The farmer shook his head. "It ain't much of an outlook," he said. "They sent their old mother to a home when she got helpless; they used to let their aunt chore around from morning until night and never gave her a cent for it; and with the sick and to pay attention to the quality and quantity of their food taking care that it is of the most nutritive kind. They are also advised to see that they have plenty of light and fresh air. If these matters are attended to the children are strengthened to resist the poisonous germs even if they inhale them. The spiritual physician would give similar advice. Temptation to evil will have little power over a child whose parents have taken care that it has been brought up in the light and in pure moral atmosphere and has been nurtured on sound moral principles. (Prov. 22: 6.)

BRIEF NOTES.

An error was made in an article in our issue of last week on "The Great Bible Revival." It was stated that the amount expended by the Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the purchase of Teachers' Bibles was $125,000. An examination of the books shows that it has exceeded $175,000; making a total in four years of $300,000.

The American Board has now in the various foreign mission fields 3298 workers of whom 557 are native Americans.

Mr. Fulton, a missionary in China, writes: During this month more money will be given in China to propitiate evil spirits which have no existence than is given for foreign missions in a whole year by all the churches in America.

The Hebrew Christian Church of New York founded by Rev.

Jacob Freshman and conducted by him for so many years is, we are informed, now a part of the City Mission work of which Dr. A. F. Schaeffer is the superintendent. Mr. Freshman will, it is understood, continue in charge of the work.

Andrew Carnegie has notified the Boards of Relief in Pittsburgh, which are supplying food and clothing to the hungry, that he will duplicate whatever amount is raised for the purpose. The amount given up to the close of the year was $62,000.

The accounts of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions have just been issued. The donations of the month were $45,979 an increase over the corresponding month of last year of $14,978.

A bookseller in Prague, Austria, is issuing an edition of the Bible in bi-weekly portions, at a price equivalent to one cent each. As the publisher is doing this as a purely business enterprise, it indicates an increased demand in that city for the Word of God.

A. L. O. E., the famous writer of many beautiful religious stories is dead. Her name was Mrs. Charlotte Tucker. For the past eighteen years she has been laboring as a missionary in India. The initials she chose for her "nom de plume" stands for "A Lady of England."

A bill has been introduced into the Legislature of South Carolina to prohibit the running on Sunday of any trains in the State, whether passenger, mail, or freight. It is stated on good authority that Gov. Tillman endorses the bill and will sign it if it is passed by the Legislature.

Dr. L. W. Munhall commenced a three weeks' course of Evangelistic services at Bay City, Mich., on Jan. 3. The indications at this date are of a very successful campaign. There has been great expectation among the churches of the results of the great preacher's visit and many prayers offered for God's blessing on the effort.

Reports from Marsovan indicate that there is a better prospect of peace for the American Missionary Institute there. The authorities stimulated by the interest taken in the college as shown in the recent troubles have taken action against the outlaws who terrorized the people. One gang led by a Russian has been completely broken up and four of its members killed.

Rev. Thomas Harrison commences a series of revival services next Sunday, Jan. 21st, in Jersey City, N. J. They will be held in Trinity Methodist Church in York Street near Cortlandt Street Ferry. Rev. John Krantz is the pastor of the church. The services just concluded in Trinity Church, Harlem, were very successful. The congregations were very large and there were many conversions.

THE LATE SIR SAMUEL BAKER AND LADY BAKER—THE EXPLORER ON LAKE ALBERT NYANZA.

the effects of the ordeal, but when they did, there was no further opposition to the match and they were married. Lovers often protest that they love each other more than life but not many could bear such a test. It is much to be wished that men loved God with the same intensity. Some when they are reproved for business practices inconsistent with their profession, make the retort that they must live. If they loved God as fervently as these two loved each other they would prefer death itself to the sin that separates them from him. (Jer. 5: 25.)

A Clever Criminal.

The detectives of the Washington Treasury, aided by the police of Brooklyn, N.Y., are searching the latter city for a remarkably clever criminal. About two weeks ago, a bank received among other large bills in the deposit of one of its regular customers, a fifty-dollar bill. There was nothing in its appearance had not a clerk referred to it to find the series to which it belonged. It did not bear the word "Series," and further examination revealed its falsity. The bill is one of several of the same kind which have reached the Treasury lately. It is done with pen and ink on government paper, and is the work of an expert artist. He simply draws the picture of a genuine note and does it so neatly and accurately that when they set the children to work 'fore they was able. I think p'raps it would be as well if they didn't make John one of the family, so to speak, but treat him more like a stranger. I think he'd fare full 's well." The farmer's complaint might be made against other families than the one in question and there are some ministers who have reason to speak so of their churches, but it is never true of the household of God. Services performed by the stranger to that family, however valuable they may be, will miss their reward. The apostle's rule is absolute, they must first give their own selves to the Lord. (11. Cor. 8: 5.)

The Fight with Bacteria.

A medical article in a Boston journal gives some practical advice as to the peculiar dangers of the microscopical plants known as bacteria. Some of the most dreaded diseases are now known to be the product of these plants which float in the air from the persons of the sick and carry contagion to the healthy. The physician who wrote the article, says that the healthy body makes a resistance to these germs and frequently expels them from the system before they have had time to do harm. It is, however, a remarkable fact that a child even if healthy is liable to infection in cases where an adult might escape. The reason is that in a child the processes of nutrition and development being in a state of super-activity, the system is receptive of bad as well as good accretions. Parents are therefore advised to keep their children as much as possible from contact

Helpful Discourses for the People.

THE NATION'S SIN AND DUTY.

A Sermon Preached in the First Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga., by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D.D. Text, Isa. 3: 11: "Woe unto the wicked, it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him."

THIS is what God commanded his prophet Isaiah to say to the people of a reprobate and wicked nation in the distant past, and it is the substance of what he requires me, and every other Christian minister in this land, to say to the people of this nation. The minister who shrinks from this grave responsibility, and who has not the nerve to declare what God has commanded him to speak, is unfit for his high vocation, and should step down and out. The God who spoke to Isaiah is the same God who speaks to you and to me. He is "the same yesterday, to-day and forever." He is a ruler. He not only exists everywhere in a limitless universe, but he reigns; he sits upon a throne and administers laws. We are more than under law, we are under a living, personal, supreme Lawmaker.

The Living Law-Giver.

We live in an age of science, and science magnifies law. It talks loudly and unceasingly about what law does. But why are many scientists so reluctant to recognize and proclaim the grander and more solemn truth, that behind all law is a Law giver and Judge? When men say that nature is self-perpetuating and self-regulating; when they say that nature determines the courses of the stars and controls the seasons, and shapes and guides all the affairs of men, do they not ascribe to it intelligence and will? And can anything have intelligence and will without personality? Verily, all things are governed; but government without a governor is unthinkable. A man may boast of being a law unto himself, and of having his own way about things in this life, but when an earthquake comes and shakes his dwelling from its foundation, or when a cyclone comes and lays his home and neighborhood in ruins, or when pestilence comes and takes away his children, and spreads over a whole city alarm and lamentation, bereavement and death, he finds himself confronted by another will immeasurably stronger than his own, and which it is folly and madness to resist. Oh! thou self-willed, God-rejecting man, hear me! There are circumstances of which you are not master. One of them is the death-chill that comes and freezes the life current in your child, and another is the stopping of your own pulse and breath.

We know not only that God exists, and that he rules the world, but we are taught both by nature and revelation, the eternal principles upon which his administration is conducted.

"Righteousness and Judgment are the habitation of his throne." His government is based on principles that are inherent in his own character. He recognizes certain immutable and everlasting distinctions between right and wrong. In dealing with men, he commends and rewards the right, and condemns and punishes the wrong. "Say to the righteous, it shall be well with him." "Woe to the wicked; it shall be ill with him." "The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, but the way of the ungodly shall perish." "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things." "But cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

Now, in the light of God's righteous character and laws, let us look out upon this troubled nation, and see what is the fundamental cause of her unrest. I believe, that in dealing with a people, God's ministers cannot improve upon the methods of the old prophets. They not only preached against sin, but they located it; pointed to it, in the most direct and fearless manner, and told the guilty why they suffered, and what they would still suffer, if they did not repent.

God helping me, I will try to follow the prophets. I do not believe that wicked men are to be benefited by telling them how much wiser, and better and more progressive they are than their fathers were. I do not believe that moral diseases can be cured by flattery. This country needs to be purified rather than glorified. I can afford to speak plainly and faithfully, because I have but little to lose. I am not, and never will be a candidate for political or social favors; I covet nothing but an abiding sense of fidelity to him whom I call "Master." I am

Neither Optimist nor Pessimist.

If I were either of these I would be unfit for the work of a Christian teacher, and unworthy of leadership in any undertaking for the public good. I try to see, and I do see, both the good and the evil in the world. I uphold and applaud the good, and I reprobate and smite the evil. In doing this, I know that I am following the wisest and holiest Being that ever ministered to mankind. I see what is meritorious in the people of this country. They are intelligent, enterprising and philanthropic. They know how to do grand things, and they have the energy and courage to do them. No people are more responsive to human suffering, though some of their methods of responding are very queer, and very incompatible with the spirit of disinterested benevolence. It is a very crooked sort of philanthropy which says, "Give me an oyster supper, or a ticket to a musical festival, or to a lecture on the Passion Play, and I will give you twenty-five cents for the Brunswick sufferers."

Notwithstanding these inconsistencies, I recognize and appreciate the fact that the American people excel all other people in kindness to the suffering and needy. And this kindness is not limited to the unfortunate of their own country. The poor and distressed of other nations will testify that their philanthropy is as broad as the earth. But in giving them full credit for all that is good, I am not blind to the fact that, as a people, they are very unrighteous, and that their vices vastly outweigh their virtues. I have not time this morning to enumerate their sins, but if you wish to know what is their most radical and characteristic sin, I tell you plainly and emphatically, it is dishonesty.

A Dishonest Nation.

From the base to the apex of American society there is visible to every eye a selfish, grasping, materialism. Everywhere men are reaching after and appropriating to themselves things which do not legitimately belong to them. They steal, but so indirectly and ingeniously, that the law, as we have it interpreted and administered, fails to overtake them. In every community of this country there are people, who, by some species of deception, manage to get hold of and lay up, or consume, or waste, a good share of what other people have honestly toiled for.

What article of food is there on the market that is not adulterated by some degrading mixture? Is not that dishonesty? Is it not theft? Is not the man who sells me adulterated milk, or adulterated butter, without letting me know it is adulterated, dishonest? Is he not a thief according to the law of God revealed in the sacred Scriptures? The merchant who deceives me as to the quality of his goods, or gives me short measure, is a thief. The same is true of the mechanic who builds my house and puts into it materials inferior to those named in his contract. It is true of the lawyer who advises his client to sue when he knows that his claim is spurious, and that it is impossible for him to recover. It is true of the doctor who continues to visit and prescribe for his patient, when he knows that his patient no longer needs medical attention. It is true of the legislator who accepts certain substantial favors from a great business corporation, with the understanding that it will have his support when called for. It is true of the newspaper man, who, when he cannot find exciting news to give to the public, makes it—coins it out of his own fertile brain. Go to New York or Chicago and visit one of those places where men gamble in grain, or meat, or railroad stocks, and you will find an army of men, who, while they would not suffer their respectability to be challenged, look one another in the face and say and do things which they know to be dishonest and villainous.

The brilliant audacity of our great commercial centres is imitated in cities as small even as Atlanta. Yes, it is attempted in our rural villages and in sight of country graveyards, where sleep the ashes of a noble ancestry—men who feared God and kept his commandments. The State makes a distinction between but God's government knows no such distinction. The man who swindles me out of a dollar and the man who picks my pocket stand on the same moral level. The State makes a distinction between the bandits who combine and rob a country store, or village bank, and those financial wreckers of Wall Street, who combine their forces, and by a single blow crush a railroad, in which thousands of people have invested the fruits of their honest toil. But tried by the law of the Bible, the men who rob a bank are no worse than the men who steal a railroad. Recently a certain class of sociologists and moralists have devoted themselves largely to the investigation of crime; its source, its statistics, and its correction. But it seems to me that these men leave out of their calculations the thousands on thousands of respectable and unpunished crimes.

The vagrant thieves, who are caught and sent to the chain-gang, are not more numerous than the gentlemanly thieves, who haunt the lobbies of legislatures, municipal chambers, and the bribeable courts, and who go into the marts of trade, and by a sort of financial jugglery, get the fruits of honest men's labor without paying much for them. The politician who gets into office by bribery, falsehood, or ballot-box stuffing, is a thief, and the virtuous element of society should rise up and brand him accordingly. The merchant who gets the trade of a community by slandering his competitors, is a thief. The newspaper publisher who gets the patronage of a city or state government by claiming a larger circulation for his paper than it has, is a thief. The contractor who gets a municipal job by dividing his profits with the committee charged with letting out the work, is a thief. But these are respectable thieves; and they are respectable only because they are Unwhipped of Justice.

I repeat it then, the great characteristic sin of this country—the great American disease is dishonesty. What is the remedy? My prescription is to point out the popular mistakes which have invited and fostered this iniquity, and then lift up against it the everlasting principles of Bible morality, and the old-fashioned safe-guards of personal integrity.

If men, who are leaders in business, politics, and social life, will not regulate their conduct by a high code of morals, their example will be pleaded by men less prominent, as a license for every species of crookedness.

I sometimes step into a commercial convention where men prominent in the great world of trade, are discussing commercial measures. I sometimes visit a political convention, where a party platform is made, and candidates for political office are nominated, and in either place I am impressed by the fact that there is very little insistence upon fealty to high ethical principles. "Will it pay?" "Is it popular?" "Will it win?" These are the considerations which determine the fate of almost any measure that comes before one of these conventions. How seldom in such a place do we hear it said, "This is right, and let us stand by it whether we win or lose." Or, "That is wrong, and let us oppose it at any cost." How seldom do we see one brave enough to rise up in the midst of this deafening clamor of calculation and profit, and say, "Sink or swim, survive or perish, let us do our duty."

If the merchant or the banker in commercial circles, or the political leader in caucus or convention or legislative hall, will not hold himself to a high standard of ethics, it is no wonder that the penniless and hungry tramp does not hold himself to it, when fortune favors him with an opportunity to rob a hen's-roost, or raid a melon-patch! If the manufacturer's conscience does not deter him from defrauding his customers with spurious goods, would it be strange if conscience did not deter his confidential clerk from running away with the contents of his money-drawer?

Undeserved Sympathy.

In looking carefully into the influences that have promoted the growth of dishonesty in this country, I am disposed to believe that an indiscreet and ill-advised sympathy for certain classes of thieves has had much to do with it.

A man who has stood high in commercial and social circles embezzles money to the amount of fifty thousand dollars. He is arrested and sent to prison. Presently, tender-hearted people, unmindful of the public weal, go abroad from street to street and from house to house, to awaken sympathy on his behalf. They carpet his cell and decorate it with the loveliest and rarest flowers. They send him the best meals which professional caterers can provide; they write beautiful and pathetic articles about him for the newspapers, and do their utmost not only to brighten but to shorten his term of punishment.

Now, while sympathy for a poor criminal is commendable, such manifestations of it as I have described are often productive of great mischief. They render the criminal less sensitive to his crime, and inspire thousands of shallow-minded people to say, "Well, after all, theft is not so disgraceful; and convicted thieves have a very good time." Do not cite the divine pity in vindication of such conduct. God's government is not unqualified pity. It is pity balanced with justice.

It is severity tempered with mercy. Theft is a crime, and justice, good government, and the best interests of society, demand that we shall make the thief feel that his crime is Disgraceful and Damnable.

There is another and a very common mistake that has done much to encourage dishonesty. It is the idea that if a man has one strong and conspicuous virtue we should be very tolerant of his vices.

One of the most distinguished men that ever occupied a seat in the Senate of the United States was notorious for making debts which he never paid, and never showed any disposition to pay, but his political friends excused him and apologized for him on the ground that he gave liberally to every beggar that came to his door. Our toleration of such looseness in public men gives license to dishonesty. A man's philanthropy is no legal or moral offset to his note in bank. He may give half of his income to the church, or to the poor, but if he will not pay his just debts, there is not one fibre of honesty in him, and society should treat him accordingly. The large sum which Ananias laid at the Apostles' feet to be distributed among the poor did not offset the lie that he told in making his gift. God smote him with instant death, to teach the world that no good deed can compensate or atone for a bad one.

Another cause for this laxity in morals, may be traced to the churches. If a church-member's religion is very emotional,—if he seems to be happy in the Lord, and if he makes profession of high spiritual attainments, we are disposed to tolerate him in neglecting many of the most of Christian life. "Wives obey your husbands." I know some women who are too pious to do that, and who will never forgive Paul for laying such an obligation upon them. I know men who are too pious to support their families. Having attained to a state of sinless perfection, they have quit work and left their wives and little children to struggle for themselves. There are some of these "saints par-excellence" who are too holy to pay a butcher's bill. Some who gaze so steadfastly into heaven, that they cannot see the deacon when he passes the contribution basket. Now, I say that the Church helps to demoralize the world, when it tolerates and fosters such ideas of religion. The man or woman who wilfully and habitually neglects a plain, domestic duty, is a very unworthy exemplar of the religion of Christ. The church-member to whom duty is less sacred than good-feeling, has a fatal misconception of the one thing needful.

In these times of unrest and anxiety, when markets are overloaded, and the wheels of industry hang idle; when merchants go to their counting-rooms in the morning, not to see how much money they can make, but how little they can lose; when church treasures and mission treasures are shrivelled and empty! when hopes are out of the hearts of the poor, not for lack of bread in the land, but for the want of work; in this unhappy state, men everywhere are asking, "What is the matter with our country?" The political doctors think that they have gone to the bottom of the matter, and they commiserate those who question the infallibility of their wisdom. But, unfortunately for the doctors, they are not agreed among themselves. One tells us that the Sherman Law is our country's woes. Another tells us that the iniquitous tariff is the Pandora box from which all our troubles come. One cries, "The Monometallists have robbed us." Another shouts, "The Bimetallists have wrecked us."

My countrymen, God knows, and I trust that the day is not far distant when you will see that the trouble lies deeper than any question of currency, or tariff, or both. The casual, radical cause of our national infelicity is a chronic state of dishonesty.

For years we have been living largely on false pretenses. Thousands of men have been swimming in wealth that was purely fictitious. Business supposed to be done on solid capital, has been done on bubbles of air. We have walked in vain shadows, and called these shadows property. Much of the luxurious living in our land has been maintained by unmitigated fraud. We have promoted to places of honor and responsibility men who have asked to be trusted when there was nothing to trust. Men capable of any duplicity and ashamed of no dishonor, have been called to the front, while men of unflinching integrity have been relegated to the rear. In every community, men with sad faces and broken hearts will tell us how they have been deceived, betrayed, and circumvented and robbed of their all.

Now what is the fruit of all this reckless, audacious, and long-continued iniquity? It is just what you see and feel to-day,—a loss of confidence. Men have ceased to trust one another, and that has brought commercial stagnation, paralysis and death. "Woe to the wicked; it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given to him." The meaning of this is that God will punish a wicked people with the inevitable and of their own folly. We had our seed-time: it was propitious. We planted, and now comes the harvest—dissension, bitterness, strife, crimination and recrimination, bankruptcy, want, cries for bread, riots, mobs, arson, robberies, murder.

What is the remedy? Any legislation is mere patch-work. It is a mere anæsthetic that can bring only temporary relief. The disease is moral, and the remedy must be moral. We must repent toward God; and the remedy must be real and radical. As individuals we must repent, and seek forgiveness of him who is exalted to give repentance and remission of sins.

As a people we must repent—we must clothe ourselves in sackcloth and sit down in ashes. We must get back to those everlasting principles of Bible morality from which we have drifted. We must put away everything that is false, dishonest, and deceptive, and return to the virtuous simplicity of our Christian fathers in the purer and happier days of the Republic. Let us do this, and deliverance will come.

It will come as the day comes,
When the night is done;
And the crimson streak on the Ocean's cheek

WHEN WRITING TO THIS OFFICE

In order to secure the promptest attention for your communications, please bear in mind that the business of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is divided into the following three departments, and that communications intended for any one of these departments should never contain matters of interest to any other department: Subscription Department in which only new subscriptions or renewals are handled.

Address Department where all changes or rectifications of name, address or date are made.

Complaint Department in which only complaints of irregular delivery receive attention.

Communications to two or three departments each written on a separate sheet, may be enclosed in one envelope, but each separate sheet should have reference only to one of these departments.

MOMENTOUS FACTS.

It is a fact that God the world's Creator,
Had made man perfect, happy and content—

A fact that Satan, heav'n's ambitious traitor,
Has led him into sin and discontent;

Isaiah, chapter first, describes him plainly:
From foot to head he's mor'ly sick and sore,

Beneath the beasts reduced, he bringeth vainly Oblations, God his Maker to adore.

It is a fact that Jesus saves the sinner;
The ransomed know it, but the stubborn don't.

He is of saving faith the sole beginner,
As Christians know, but many sinners won't.

Why would he, if he did not love them dearly,
Entreat them to forsake their wicked ways,

And to believe on him and pray sincerely
To God, in his dear name, for pard'ning grace?

It is a fact that sinners must be punished
Hereafter, if unpardoned they remain
Through life, and be amazingly astonished
At what they've lost and never can regain.

Hence, sinners, now accept your Saviour's offer
Of pard'ning mercy, which will make you free.

You would, indeed, too late accept his proffer,
When once procrastination's fruit you'll see.

It is a fact that Christ the ransomed sinner Preserves, and through temptations keeps secure.

He has, in every contest, been the winner—
Has foiled the foe, and rendered vict'ry sure.

Disconsolation e'en and discontentment
Would, to a great extent, soon disappear,
If man and man, by showing less resentment,
Would love each other, and their God, with fear

Signs of the Times.

Indications of the Near Approach of the Crisis Predicted by the Prophets.

BY REV. HENRY VARLEY.*

THE Master said that Jerusalem should be trodden down until the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled, and it is trodden down still. And all the wars of all the ages have failed to rescue the Holy City permanently from the hands of her enemies. The ruler of Jerusalem to-day is the Sultan of Turkey, who is the great ruler of the Mahomedan races. Nothing can lift the heel of the Gentile from the neck of Zion but the coming of her King.

When did the "times of the Gentiles" begin? With the days of Nebuchadnezzar. There are two comings of Nebuchadnezzar to carry away the Jews and tread down Jerusalem. The first was in the year 610, the second the year 605, before Christ. Then the "times of the Gentiles" began to take the place of the "times of Israel," and since that time the Gentiles have been supreme.

We have already seen that according to Leviticus XXVI, Israel was to have seven times of judgment, and the Gentiles seven times of supremacy. Now, a time consists of 360 years. Seven times would be 2,520 years, and measuring this interval from the times of Nebuchadnezzar would bring us to a period less than one-fourth of a century in the future. So that if the chronology of prophecy be worth anything, we know where we are in the panorama of the ages. We are very near to the last sands in the hour glass of the dispensation.

If I was sailing on a ship that was due in Sydney in forty days, I should be justified in concluding when the thirty-ninth day had come, that we must be near the land; and although I might see no shore-line, or mountain-peak, yet I might confidently say, "We shall see the land-marks soon, for the time is expired."

I am not a Democrat, but a Theocrat. I thank God that the time is near when there shall be no more Presidents of the United States, no more Kings or Queens in Great Britain, no more Emperors of all the Russias, but Christ will be King of kings.

The stone of Daniel's vision is about to fall, not on the feet, but on the head of the great earthly powers, and dash it in pieces, as a potter's vessel.

There will be a chance for the world then. If ever a set of governments wanted smashing up, it is true of the governments of to-day. We are not going to do it; anarchists and revolutionists are not going to do it. But Christ is going to take the matter in hand himself, and that right soon.

Do not say the Holy Ghost is competent for the world's conversion. The Holy Ghost is competent for any work that the Lord has set him to do. But the Holy Ghost was never sent to convert the world. The Holy Ghost is to gather the bride out of the nations, and when the bridegroom comes every knee shall bow to him.

Christ never said that the world would receive the Holy Ghost, but, on the contrary, he said, "Him the world will not receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him." The church receives the Spirit, and when the church is completed the Lord will come.

I want you to notice the remarkable passage in 1. Timothy 4, "Which in his times he shall show." This blessed truth of the Lord's coming is not understood until the time draws near. But it is in his times that he is to show it, and he is now beginning to show it, and the fact that he is so doing is one of the most remarkable signs of the times. God is opening the eyes of his people to understand the vision of prophecy as never before, and in a little while he himself will meet the expectation which he has awakened, and come in all the glory of his kingdom, and then the will of God will be done in earth as it is in heaven.

What is it that makes heaven? The fact that there is only one will there. The supremacy of God is the only source of heaven, and earth will never be like heaven until Christ is supreme.

GOD'S PROMISES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Jan. 28, Feb. 6: 9-20.

FAITH ought not to be a mysterious or incomprehensible thing to any man who has had experience in business. The faith God requires of men is the same, in its nature, as the confidence continually exercised in the business world. Every man who accepts a note from his customer, every banker who discounts commercial paper, every man who insures his life or property, every one who takes a greenback in exchange for goods, exercises faith. He gives value for a promise. The life policy, or the greenback, is intrinsically worth comparatively nothing, but it is accepted willingly, because it is an undertaking to pay—that is, a promise. The value of any such promise depends on the ability and integrity of the promiser. The man receiving it has satisfied himself that the promiser can and will pay at the time, and under the circumstances agreed upon. In spiritual matters God asks us to believe in him as implicitly as we do in a life insurance company, or in the National Treasury. The demand is not unreasonable. The most elementary conception of God precludes any doubt of his being able and willing to do everything he has promised.

What, then, has God promised? In turning over the pages of the Bible we find them rich in his promises. There is no ambiguity about them. They are plain and direct, and the conditions are fully set forth. They are of various kinds, but the large majority of them are for men who live in a specified way. To those who live after the spirit, is the promise of everlasting life, combined with the promise of all necessary things in the present world. They who seek first, or chiefly, the kingdom of God will gain what they seek and all necessary things will be added thereto. Luxuries are not promised, nor is there any guarantee of immunity from trials or sorrows or pain. There is, however, the promise that whatever painful befalls, shall work for the highest and best good of the man. The broad and narrow ways, which Christ used as an illustration, happily describe the position. On the one are sensual delights, the acquisition of wealth, worldly influence and power and the gratification of the animal nature; on the other there are discipline, self-denial, duty, demands for help, which must be met, and constant effort. At the end of the former, the traveller lays down all he has acquired, even the body, which he has nourished, and stands poverty-stricken beyond conception. At the end of the narrow way, the spirit, enriched by the treasures acquired on the way, strengthened and developed by the discipline and the effort, loses nothing but the body, which has been an incumbrance and a source of trouble, and it steps into a state not described in detail, but generally as one of unqualified felicity. To the spiritual man belong the promises and not one of them will fail.

A MODEST RECORD.

A singularly sweet and beautiful communication is sent to the "Silver Cross" from Northern Wisconsin. It is the report of a Circle of King's Daughters in a small town of a few hundred inhabitants and the writer, with a more careful observance of the Saviour's command to keep the left hand from knowing what the right hand does than is common in these days of blatant advertising, refrains from mentioning, not only the names of the workers, but the name of the town that is blessed by their presence. It appears that, for some time past, work in the neighborhood has been scarce and poorly remunerated. The pine forests are smaller every year and the laborers are fewer in number. So there has been much suffering and the churches are too small and weak to do much toward the alleviation of it. "But," says the writer of the letter, "we find here a company of children in a humble home, dressed warmly and made comfortable; there, a cold and cheerless hearth, brightened by a load of dry hard wood; here the rent paid and food provided for a homeless old lady; there, a physician provided and medicines furnished to a suffering, poverty-stricken family. A shanty home, where, through the cracks of open windows, the winter's snow formerly came in gusts, is made snug and endurable. Comfortables and blankets provide warm beds for the weary. All this is done, in His Name, by ten working girls, who are the pioneer members of the Order of King's Daughters, in Among its pledges for the present year are $100 for foreign missions, $25 to the building fund of Central College, and $10 to the Young Men's Christian Union.—Dr. J. F. Berry makes a stirring appeal to the Epworth Leagues throughout the country to come to the help of the Missionary Society, and encourage it by so large an offering that the contemplated reduction in its force in the field may not be made.

A SOUTHERN Y. M. C. A.

The members of the Young Men's Christian Association of Griffin, Ga., are to be congratulated on the possession of the beautiful home-like building, a picture of which appears on this page. The Association is one of the youngest in the country, having been organized in 1890, and it speaks volumes for the energy and enterprise of its members and the good-will and liberality of the citizens of Griffin, that in so short a time, they have been able to purchase so handsome a home as that into which they have now moved. The building cost $2,626. It is three stories in height. The basement is used for gymnasium, baths, etc.; the second

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

The sub-district Convention was held recently in the Centenary Church, Attleborough, Mass., at which Rev. G. Conte, the Italian missionary in Boston, gave a description of his work. Rev. C. E. Beale presided and among the speakers were: Mr. R. S. Douglass, Rev. J. S. Wadsworth, Rev. M. S. Kaufman and Rev. L. G. Horton.—The monthly mass-meeting of the League in Washington, D. C., recently held in Hainline Church was attended by nearly twelve hundred members. The president was Mr. C. M. L. Sites, whose father is a missionary in China. At the song and testimony meeting, which was conducted by Mr. James E. Pugh, 479 testimonies were given.—The First Church of Lynn, Mass., has a League of 250 members, and its Junior League numbers over a hundred. They are doing good service and are a valued assistance to the pastor in church and pastoral work.—The Epworth Leagues of Kentucky are to hold a Convention on February 8 and 9 at Louisville. Free entertainment will be provided for out-of-town delegates. A very large gathering and a very profitable time are expected.—One of the pastors who was recently appointed to a new charge where there was no Epworth League, made it his first business to organize one. To his officers he made the following statement: "After seeing the working of a League in my former charge, I would not know how to get story comprises the Reception Hall, Reading-Room, Library, Parlor, "Leisure Room" and a gallery overlooking the gymnasium; on the third story is the Auditorium and class-rooms. It is a busy place, for there is a Gospel meeting, Bible class or Literary meeting every evening of the week and a special meeting for men on Sunday afternoons. A flourishing Boys' Auxiliary is connected with the Association and its members are encouraged to use its appliances. The Association is exceptionally fortunate in its officers. Mr. G. R. Niles, the President and Mr. C. I. Stacy, the General Secretary, are model officers, devoted to their work, and with the magnetism of character which adds so greatly to the value of men engaged in Christian work among young people.

A PRESIDENTIAL TOUR.

An extensive tour of the Western States is to be made during the next six weeks by Mr. John H. Chapman, President of the Baptist Young People's Union. The objects of the tour are thus described by Mr. Frank E. Harrington, the Secretary of that section, in a letter to the "Standard": "It is designed to (1) Bring greetings of the International Union; (2) Give by addresses and convention programmes a clear definition of the principles of the movement; (3) Give our leaders in the local societies opportunities to meet and confer, face to face, with one, the President; (4) Come closer together as Baptist young people for fellowship and inspiration; (5) Establish closer relations with a view to the prosecution of all that concerns our Baptist churches in this growing West; (6) Seek a new endowment of the Holy Spirit that we may be more effective winners of souls. The following are the dates and places on the programme: Heler Mont., January 19; Spokane, Wash., 2; Victoria, B. C., 23; Seattle, Wash., 25; Tacoma, Wash., 26; Portland, Ore., 28; Salem, Ore., 29; Sacramento, Cal., Feb. 2; Oakland, Cal., 2; San Francisco, Cal., 5; San Jose, Cal., 6; Fresno, Cal., 8; Los Angeles, Cal., 11; San Diego, Cal., 12; Ogden, Utah, 16; Salt Lake City, Utah, 17; Grand Junction, Colo., 19; Pueblo, Colo., 21; Colorado Springs, Colo., 22; Denver, Colo., 25.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A small band of open-air preachers connected with the Young Men's Christian Association of Cork, Ireland, were subjected to a somewhat serious assault in the Mall on a recent Sunday. In the course of the disturbance a Bible was snatched from the hands of one of the young men, and was set on fire.

A Sunday School at Yonkers, N. Y., has organized several circles of King's Daughters and Sons from the children in the school. Part of the contributions go to a general fund and the remainder is credited to the respective circles contributing, and is applied to any special work they indicate.

The latest statistics of the Christian Endeavor Society show that there are now 28,741 societies, of which 5,995 are found in Presbyterian churches, and 5,602 in Congregational churches. New York leads with 3,119 societies.

A Potato Rally is one of the latest novelties in Christian Endeavor work. Its introduction is credited to Cleveland, Ohio, where it resulted in the contribution of a large quantity of vegetables of all kinds and a good amount of clothing, to be distributed among the poor of the city.

At Traverse City, Mich., the New Year was celebrated by the Christian Endeavor Societies by a large united meeting. A reception was held in the evening and each Society sent a souvenir by mail to its absent members and the members who had removed from the city.

The Baptist Young People's Unions of Iowa have pledged themselves to raise two hundred dollars for ministerial education this year. The amount is divided in one dollar shares and the individual Unions are invited to take up as many of these as they are able, and pay during the year.

The new Methodist Episcopal Church at Scranton, Pa., has a well-furnished reading room for the joint use of the Epworth League and the King's Daughters.

A unique society is the Ladies' Christian Endeavor Society reported from Angola, Ind., as designed only for those ladies that before their admission had never taken part in a prayer meeting.

The Epworth League of First Church, San Jose, Cal., has 200 members. Work is being done in the hospital, almshouse, jail, and the homes of the poor. Forty families were supplied with food and clothing last month.

The "Epworth Herald" announces that Bedford Street Church, New York City, is the first church to employ regularly an assistant as drill-master for a company of Epworth Guards, fifty in number. In addition to the Bedford Street company, he drills several other companies of Epworth Guards and Boys' Brigades.

Several of the State Christian Endeavor Conventions have adopted distinctive colors for the easy recognition of their delegates, at International Conventions and elsewhere. Pennsylvania has selected red and blue, Delaware has adopted red and white, Philadelphia has chosen blue and white. Cleveland's colors, which will be the colors of next year's Convention, are white and gold.

Ancient American Idols.

Some Interesting Stone Images Unearthed in Tennessee.

FROM a correspondent and reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Chattanooga, Tenn., comes the following letter:

"There was found on a mountain in Bradley County, Tenn., a stone wall buried under the ground, with hieroglyphic characters or letters resembling Hebrew. We have dug down sixteen feet underground, and the lettering still goes on down. Twelve feet under ground we found the foot-prints of a large person (left foot 13 inches long, 5 1/2 inches broad), with letters in the heel of foot-print. I have photographs of the wall and letters. We also have photographs of stone images, found or ploughed up out of a mound at the mouth of the High Nassie River by Henry Wather in March, 1891, near the stone wall, and with a stone with similar letters to those found in the wall on each side of stone. I send you a photograph of the stone images. These images have holes in their ears and in the back of the head, and there are loops by which they have been strung up. Is it possible that a race of people worshipped those images?"

W. F. DUNCAN."

Carved figures, similar to those in the photograph forwarded by our correspondent, which is reproduced on this page, have been found in excavations in different parts of Mexico and Central America, and are doubtless relics of the ancient Aztec civilization and religion which extended over a great part of this continent. Those vestiges of a vanished race are met with throughout the southern part of North America, the Isthmus and the northern portion of South America. In some parts of Yucatan, ruins have been found which bear a strange resemblance to those of Egypt, with carvings and inscriptions that point to the possibility of a Jewish origin. It is also known that some of the ceremonials in use among those long-forgotten people bore a striking resemblance to those of the ancient Jewish nation, and these, together with other collateral evidence, have led several ethnologists to adopt the theory that the original settlers in the central part of the American continent may have been either descendants of or allied to the ancient Hebrews.

About the theology of the Aztecs, or of their predecessors the Toltecs and Chichimecs, little is known beyond the fact that they worshipped a multiplicity of gods, including the sun, moon and stars, and that their country abounded in temples and idols, and also in altars and stones for human sacrifice. They believed in a middle state after death, and in eternal punishment for the wicked. They were skilled workers in metals and capable sculptors, as far as the art of their time went, and were, besides, astronomers of deep research and had a method of time measurement by which the year was divided into 18 months of 20 days each. Not even the Egyptians excelled them in the beauty and variety of their architecture, and their temples were profusely decorated with symbolic carvings, inscriptions and grotesque representations of their different deities. Sacrifice was a prominent part of Aztec worship. In some years, thousands of human victims seem to have been immolated as an offering to their gods.

It is possible that the little stone images, unearthed by our correspondent, may have been cherished as domestic deities in some "Mound-Builders'" household. Somewhat similar finds have been made in "tumuli" or mounds in Ohio and other States, constructed by the "Mound-Builders," who were a distinct race, having no connection with the Indian tribes that are now found scattered through North America. These "Mound-Builders" apparently occupied a circumscribed region, bounded by the Alleghanies and Missouri River. They have utterly vanished, leaving no record in the form of hieroglyphics or other writings or pictures, the only evidence of their existence being the curiously-shaped mounds.

Stop and Think.

My boy, when they ask you to drink,
Stop and think.
Just think of the danger ahead;
Of the hearts that in sorrow have bled,
O'er hopes that were drown'd in the bowl,
Filled with death for the body and soul.

Yes, when you are tempted to drink,
Stop and think
Of the danger that lurks in the bowl,
The death that it brings to the soul.
The harvest of sin and of woe,
And spurn back the tempter with "No!"

How a Poor Man Rose to High Honors.

It is known to few that President Freier of the Swiss Republic has had a very eventful career. Born of parents in comparatively moderate circumstances, he came to this country a political exile some thirty years ago. He was extremely destitute and secured employment as a woodchopper in a western State. Later he went to Illinois, and enlisted in the Union army; rose to the rank of major; was captured at Gettysburg, and confined in Libby, where he was once drafted to be shot in retaliation for the sentence pronounced by the Federals against a Captain Gordon; but execution was finally postponed because our Government held the life of another officer as hostage for his own. After the war, he returned to Berne, Switzerland, and by his talents rose rapidly in public life, represented his government at Washington, became Secretary of War, held other offices, and has now been elected President. All this comes out in a grateful letter written his fellow woodchopper, J. A. Gratzold, son of his first American employer. President Freier's success has not made him forgetful or ungrateful, and he still remembers with pleasure the kind people who fed and sheltered him when he was hungry and homeless in those early days. He is said to be a simple, straightforward God-fearing man, who deserves his honors.

An Object Lesson in Politeness.

Politeness, once acquired, is one of the pleasantest accomplishments in the world, and graces its possessor. Here is the story of an object-lesson in the art of politeness which occurred lately: An old truckman was bending under the weight of a big roll of carpet. His bale-hook fell from his hand and bounded into the gutter out of reach. Twenty idle clerks and salesmen saw the old man's predicament, and smiled at his look of bewilderment. No one ventured to help him. A young woman came along, took in the situation at a glance, and without looking to the right or left, stepped into the gutter, picked up the hook in her dainty gloved fingers and handed it to the man with a Real Pleasure.

I remember a friend of mine, writes Rev. James Stalker, D.D., who had gone far into what is called "a life of pleasure," telling me, when he became a Christian, that what surprised him most of all was this—he had always looked on religion as a burden which he knew he ought to carry; but he found that it was something that carried him and his burden too. He said also that he had enjoyed in a single week, after he was a Christian, more real pleasure than in all the years he had devoted to what is termed the pursuit of pleasure. I am convinced this is the view of religion needed in a great city where the individual is lost in the great multitude.

Keep Your Promises.

There are many people who will promise anything you ask of them, but make a small matter of keeping their promises. They enter into engagements with you to do this or that, to meet you or call on you at a certain time, or to do some favor for you, and utterly fail to fulfil their engagements. It is a noble thing when we find one whose promises we are as sure of as the rising of the sun; whose simplest word is as good as his oath: who does just what he says he will do at the moment he says he will do it. That is the kind of faithfulness God wants.

Domineering People.

There are some persons who seem to have a "faculty" for giving orders. They believe themselves born to rule. Sometimes a servant in the house will exercise more authority than the master or the mistress; will give more commands, find more fault, make

"HE KNOWS."

I KNOW not what awaits me,
God kindly veils mine eyes,
And o'er each step on my onward way
He makes new scenes to rise,
And every joy he sends me comes
A sweet and glad surprise.
Where he may lead I'll follow,
My trust in him repose:
And every hour in perfect peace
I'll sing "He knows! He knows!"

One step I see before me;
'Tis all I need to see:
The light of heaven more brightly shines,
When earth's illusions flee;
And sweetly through the silence comes
His loving—"Follow me!"

Oh, blissful lack of wisdom;
'Tis blessed not to know;
He holds me with his own right hand,
And will not let me go:
And lulls my troubled soul to rest
In him who loves me so.

So on I go—not knowing,
I would not if I might;
I'd rather walk in the dark with God,
Than go alone in the light;
I'd rather walk by faith with him,
Than go alone by sight.

FIND OUT YOUR GIFT.

EVERY one of us has a gift, says Rev. J. Reid Howard in a recent sermon to children. There is something we can all do better than we can do most things else. One boy can make a boat better than he can do sums; another boy can do sums better than he can make a boat. One girl can't write very well, but she can draw beautifully; another can't draw at all, but she can write very neatly. One man is very stupid when he tries to make a speech, but wait till you see him in business, and you will find that he understands that; another man is a capital speaker, a regular orator in fact, but he isn't of much use among figures, and account-books, and scales and yard-sticks and hammers. Everyone has his gift, and no two have exactly the same. One has it for one thing, and another has it for another; and all because, why? Just because there wouldn't be room for us all in the world if we all had the same gift: our gift is given to us to open up our own way and to make the right room for us. Do you remember how it was with Joseph? He was a smart lad, and good at figures, and sharp to look into things; and when he saw that there was going to be a famine, he worked it all out in big sums, compound addition and long division, and so he saw how the people could be kept from starving. That was his gift, and it made room for him, room at the top, for it brought him to be the chief man in Egypt. And there was Samuel. He was a very poor boy, but he was fond of learning—that was his gift; and he worked at it, and worked at it, till it made room for him, and he came to be the first man in Israel.

And, besides, there was David; you can't forget David. He had his gift: it was music. He could play well and sing well, and, better than all, he could make sweet, sweet songs that did the heart good to hear; and you know his gift made room for him, room on the throne itself. And there was Daniel. He was a poor slave boy, but he had his gift, the great, great gift of thinking about God in everything. And you remember how his gift made room for him, so that, poor as he had been, he came at length to stand among the greatest men of his time.

There is room for us all in the world; but if ever we are to come by that room, then we must look well to the way we make use of our gifts. And the best way to do this is to be always remembering that they are gifts. They must have been given to us, or how could they be gifts? Then, surely, the last thing in the world should be our getting conceited or showing that we are proud about them.

Keep that in mind, and whatever your gift may be, keep on rubbing it: it is the rubbing that makes it bright, and the brighter it gets, the better it will bring to you whatever you wish. These are good points for young people to remember.

"ISN'T it?" said the nurse. "You see when poor little Willy Barnes was so bad with the whooping-cough, and the other two down—I never saw children have it harder—and I was called in to help with them, Willy would go to sleep in my arms to that hymn sooner than to any other. And Mrs. Barnes, a-hearing me going over it again and again, and him a-begging for 'the sleep-song, nurse,' would know where I got it, and all about it. After the children got well—and, as I needn't tell you, doctor, I just couldn't let my pastor's wife pay me a cent, for, as I told her, I came out of her house richer and fuller in spirit than if she'd given me double price for the little I'd done—she sent me the two little boys' pictures, and that poem, all elegantly framed, just as you see it, and the loveliest letter I ever read. I told her I'd ought to have a border painted around that and frame it too."

"You see"—pointing—"in that corner is Willy, and me a-rocking him to sleep;—you'd know my cap and apron in Madagascar, but the rest of it is altogether too good-looking for me, as I told her. And over there is the shepherd a-driving his flock before him, when the old grass inside the wall is all eaten bare; and the border at the bottom is the hurdle. She explained about it to me, and what is the meaning of 'wattled?'"

She stopped to laugh here.

"Would you believe it? I had some sort of a notion that it had something to do with a turkey-gobbler, and kind o' skipped over the word in my singing and my thoughts. Being educated is a drawback sometimes. And at the top—don't you see how the border is all angel's wings, a-touching and a-lapping one another and a-shining? They are the 'shining ones there still,' you know. I never mistrusted what Mrs. Barnes was up to when she asked me to let her copy the piece I'd worn into rags. I was 'most ashamed to have her see it, but newspaper won't stand much wear."

The doctor recovered himself with a start from a critical inspection of the really clever etching, brightened effectively by artistic gilding and coloring.

"By Jap!" People forgave the enigmatical adoration because he was never heard to use any other under the strongest excitement. "You have made me waste a good half-hour here in feasting and folly when I ought to be at work. I'll see you again about six o'clock. I left orders with the Scotch woman that would hold until then. She is a faithful creature, and behaved better than could have been expected, when we told her we must have in another nurse. She is very much attached to her mistress, and has worked like ten horses since she fell ill. Yet I shall feel easier when you are to the fore."

"Good-bye, and thank you again for a first-rate luncheon and an A. 1 sermon. As a human sparrow—unless you prefer to class me with the snow-flakes—I ought to be better for both."

The genial smile had not faded out when he signalled his carriage which was toiling up and down the street, with clogged wheels and whitened horses.

"That woman is a character!" he soliloquized, after he shut himself in and on the way to his next patient. "She may be a fanatic, but she is the happiest, jolliest, most useful soul I know."

Not a falling intonation or shade of expression had betrayed to him her disappointment at the failure of her plan for securing her "one real rest-day." The deep easy-chair that had descended to her with her name from her grandmother, already stood midway between the grate and the front windows, where the light would fall over her left shoulder, and on a stand beside it, that was as old as the chair, lay a well-thumbed copy of "Stepping Heavenward." Mrs. Barnes had introduced her husband's parishioner to the incomparable religious classic, which had straightway become a chief favorite with the woman who had little time for reading of any kind. She was wont to speak of it as "the only novel she had ever cared to read more than once." She was on the fifth perusal now, and had meant to devote all the daylight that remained after the dishes were washed, the white cloth superseded by a red, and the hearth swept—to enjoyment of pages which always helped and never tired her. She had hoped when twilight should steal between her and "Stepping Heavenward," to treat herself to a refreshing nap, her feet upon a footstool, the fire making cheer on one side, the snow curtaining out the world on the other. She had promised to take tea with the friendly "folks down-stairs," and at ten o'clock would be in bed "trying to get slept out," after vigils many and wearing.

As it was, she summoned the little girl from below and sent to her mother everything left over from her Thanksgiving dinner. There was no telling when she would be able to sit down again at her own table. At four o'clock, the cozy comfortableness of the "living-room" had given place to the chill formality of preparation for being left "all right." The chairs had retreated to the walls; the table-cover was on wrong side out; the Holland shades were drawn down; the still warm grate was empty, and Nurse Williams, setting her capacious satchel, packed and locked, down upon the floor, knelt to commend herself and the task she was entering upon to him who feeds the birds and clothes the grass of the field. As for herself, as she confessed to this ever-hearing Friend, the utmost skill she could command could not make one hair white or black, or keep in the passing breath for the thousandth part of a minute. She was, at her best, only, a willing tool in the hands of the Master-Workman. All that she could do was to get it clean and to offer it, with the handle held toward him, until he was ready to use it.

The snow had been shoveled from the sidewalk and the steps of 363. The inhabitants of other houses on the block were apparently content to await the slackening of the storm before attacking the drifts. It was little past four o'clock when Nurse Williams ploughed sturdily through these, yet it was quite dark. The street-lamps were lighted, and transmuted into a golden shower the falling flakes within a radius of a few feet of each. Above the doors, and through the windows of the dwellings on both sides of the way, yellow and ruddy lances of light stabbed the gray outer glooms. Here and there, a shade had been forgotten, or purposely left up by a charitable householder, willing to share his holiday cheer with the wayfarer, and the nurse had a picture of an interior that, in her unspoken thought, "kind o' chirked her up." She was thankful that other homes were bright, warm, and happy, although the fire upon her hearth-stone had been extinguished.

Her subdued ring at the door of 363 was answered promptly by a raw-boned, high-cheeked Scotchwoman with gray hair and shrewd eyes.

"I am the nurse sent by Dr. Bacon. My name is Williams," was the visitor's self-introduction.

Quiet tone and straight-forward address were an instant recommendation. Elspeth was a true Gael in her readiness to form prejudices, and her reluctance to dismiss them.

"Ye are welcome, and ye can come right up, so soon as ye've had a word with Mr. Lanier, the mistress's brother."

There would be no words wasted in preliminaries between these two. A gentleman appeared in the doorway of the parlor while Elspeth was speaking.

"Good evening, Mrs. Williams. You can take her valise upstairs, Elspeth. She will be up in a few moments. Wait for her in the upper hall."

He spoke courteously, but with authority; his refined face and bearing bespoke the gentleman; his expression was grave to sadness.

"Please step into this room," he continued, standing back to let her precede him. "I'm Mr. Lanier, of New York. Mrs. Paul is my sister. Mrs. Lanier—my wife—is confined to the house by a severe cold, or she would be here. In her absence, the responsibility of superintending the arrangements for Mrs. Paul's comfort devolves upon me." He bent a scrutinizing gaze upon the matronly face—respectful and interested. "I need not explain to you how useless a man is in a sick-room. My sister is very dear to me—and to my wife—and she is dangerously ill. I wish you to spare no trouble or expense in her behalf. Dr. Bacon's recommendation is security for your skill, and for your discretion. I wish you, furthermore, to be perfectly candid in your reports of her condition from day to day. I may say, also"—another and longer look—"what it is well for you, as an intelligent nurse, to know before going to her—that this illness has been aggravated, if it was not brought on, by mental anxiety. If possible, keep your patient from raving, or, should she have lucid intervals, from asking questions. If she will talk, promise anything in reason—or out of it—that will pacify her. Say to her, should she intimate a desire to discuss her anxieties with me, that I have promised to do all in my power to bring matters out right. Ask her to trust me until she is strong enough to think and talk."

"Perhaps"—seeming to gauge the moral force of the listener by a test of his own—"you have scruples against deceiving, or even equivocating to a delirious patient? You would not be willing to do even so little an evil that a great good might be brought about?"

He looked so kind, with all his seriousness, that she answered frankly:

"There is no lie—ever—in saying that everything will come out right, sir. I'll do my best for the poor lady, and may the dear Lord of us all help me!"

"Amen! and thank you!"

To her surprise—for she had set him down at first sight as "a genuine high-stepper, and no mistake," he shook hands with her and dismissed her, saying that he would remain in the house until after the doctor's next visit.

Elspeth was waiting, according to instructions, in the upper hall, and showed the nurse to a chamber where she might change her dress, designating the door of the sick-room as they passed it, and telling her to come in when she was ready.

"And the sooner the better!" she subjoined.

"Why do you say that?" demanded accents, the sharpness of which contrasted strangely with the youthful quality of the voice.

A pretty girl with golden hair put back carelessly from her face, and blue eyes too weary and dry for her years, met them upon the threshold of the hall bed-room to which Mrs. Williams had been directed.

"I did not go up-stairs to lie down as you told me to do," she went on to Elspeth, noticing the new arrival only by a slight and haughty inclination of the head. "I would not go out of hearing of my mother. I am able and anxious to watch with her to-night, and every night. I cannot see the necessity, as you and Uncle Roger do, of bringing in any one else to help us. I am accountable to my father for all that goes on here in his absence—remember! Whatever nurse you engage must not be left in ignorance as to who is the master of this house."

"There is no danger of that, Miss Marie," rejoined Elspeth, with no show of temper.

Mrs. Williams slipped into the chamber-door, and the serving-woman closed it upon her. Whatever colloquy followed the withdrawal of the third person to the little scene, was unheard by her. There were, evidently, other complications to be dealt with than pulmonary in the new case.

Dr. Bacon found her in full charge of the chamber of illness at his evening visit.

"You have made your mark already," he told her when, after ten minutes spent at the bedside of the patient, the nurse obeyed his summons to follow him into the adjoining apartment.

He spoke in a professional undertone, nodding backward at the interior visible through the half-open door. "Got all ship-shape in there, I see. Close-reefed and ready for rough weather. There's nothing like the touch a professional nurse gives to the sick-room. Where's the daughter?"

"Elspeth coaxed her to go to bed, I believe. I only saw her for a minute when first came."

"Good! I had my fears that she might make things a little more lively than agreeable—poor thing! She is awfully cut up by her mother's illness, and has an idea that everything depends upon her young shoulders while the father is away. Was very tart with her uncle when he told her in my hearing that we must have you in. She is wonderfully bright and capable, but, delirious as the mother is, the daughter's worry affected her unpleasantly. There are times as you and I know, when relatives,—especially affectionate and anxious relatives—are not the proper people to be about a sick person. There's something exciting in the very atmosphere under such circumstances. Well! what do you think of the outlook?"

"She's a very sick woman. And I mistrust that she's been ill longer than people know. She's likely kept up when she ought to have been in her bed. Like walking-typhoid, you know. I've seen her before. For a half-hour or so, I couldn't just think where. By-and-by, she tried to sing—a pretty poor try it was, with her hoarse voice and short breath—and it flashed in upon me. 'Twas last Friday night at a prayer-meeting in our lecture-room—the Jeremy Taylor, you know. She got in late, and there was a sort of queer look about her. I was right across the aisle, and I saw, presently, that her color had all gone out, the same as the flame of a candle, and she turned so pale and her mouth was so drawn that, being as I am, a nurse, I couldn't but feel that 'twas right to keep an eye on her, from time to time. I was afraid she was going to drop in a faint."

"So you watched while the others prayed?" unable to deny himself the joke.

"I watched between the prayers, sir," answered the nurse, not without dignity. "I could have made sure she was asleep, sometimes, if her hands hadn't squeezed one another hard, and her face twitched now and then. So I was fairly taken off my feet, as you may say, when the last hymn was sung, and she joined in all on a sudden with a voice like an angel's—a strong angel too. Mrs. Barnes, she sings most delightfully, and she raised the tune—there being no man there who could do it—and was a-carrying of it well, but this strange lady just took it away from her, and led us all along with her, so pitiful and so earnest-like that I couldn't think of anything but—'I will not let thee go, until thou bless me!' The words were, 'I need thee every hour,' and, thinks-I-to-myself, 'There's one that means every single word she's singing.' It gave me quite a turn when she started up the same tune awhile ago."

Dr. Bacon lent an attentive ear.

"The fever was upon her then; there is no question of that. It was lucky for her—I beg your pardon, it was providential—that she did not wander away and get lost."

"Well, Nurse! we've got to roll up our sleeves and fall to in good earnest, if we are to pull our patient through. Mind and body are both against us, I suspect, not counting in the author and forwarder and general backer of all disease—the evil principle you call the devil."

Thus began over the prostrate body of Alice Paul, the hand-to-hand fight that lasted without respite for ten days longer. The doctor did his part gallantly; Mr. Lanier's purse and time were at his sister's service; at his suggestion, two New York medical magnates whose very breath might be reckoned as currency, so costly was every word, visited the patient three times in consultation with the physician in charge.

Foremost and indefatigable, the nurse fought in the breach. She seemed to live without sleep except for the two hours of the forenoon when the sick woman was most quiet, and Elspeth insisted on sitting with her. In all that week-and-a-half, Mrs. Williams did not leave the house; never lost heart; never raised her voice above its accustomed pitch, or hurried her even speech by so much as a quarter-breath. That hushed upper chamber was her world, and within it, she effaced herself so far as consideration of her personal ease was concerned. The one created being in all the universe for her lay there, parched by fever, moaning in delirious agony, the demon in possession tugging at the tense, attenuated thread of her existence.

It was like the tossing of a frail boat in a storm, each pitch and wrench grinding the calm le upon the toothed rocks of the beach.

Christian Work in Japan.

Young Lady Graduates at Osaka—An Interesting Mission Work.

THROUGH the courtesy of Rev. Joshua Kimber, D.D., Associate Secretary of the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church we are enabled to present on this page, a most interesting photograph of two graduates from the Ladies' Institute, Osaka, Japan, with their teacher. These ladies, who now enter upon active duty in connection with the Women's Auxiliary work, are the first graduates from the institute at Osaka, and special interest attaches to them on that account. In a recent letter from Japan to "The Spirit of Missions," Miss Bull, of the Woman's Auxiliary will appreciate her and make her happy. "The other dear child is the daughter of a retainer of the Prince of Wakayama. In the days before the revolution which put an end to the feudal power, and when she was a little girl, the family lived in a large and beautiful place at Wakayama. But the incomes of the "samurai" shrank when the feudal system came to an end; now Miss Shioji's father lives comfortably in Osaka, but not in grand style as before; and although he has not found a higher object for his allegiance than his Prince and his Emperor, his wife and young daughter and son have become followers of the Prince of Peace. Miss Shioji was baptized at the same time with Miss Kitazato and they have been dear friends ever since. Miss Shioji became a pupil at the Institute a few months earlier than Miss Kitazato. She has great musical talent, and excels in all kinds of manual accomplishments, both Japanese and foreign. She has played the organ at St. John's Church for several years, and trained the orphans to sing. She writes and speaks English nearly as well as Miss Kitazato. We are very fortunate in being able to keep Miss Shioji still at the Institute. I have given her the English writing-class, a class in writes: "The young lady on the right is Miss Kitazato. She is of an excellent family in Kyushu, one of the two large Southern islands of Japan. Her eldest brother is one of the most eminent physicians in Japan, a famous microscopist. Miss Kitazato is also cousin of Mr. Otsuka, the first catechist who had charge of St. John's Church, Osaka. She has been a pupil of the Institute about four years. When she had been studying two years, we lost our translation teacher, and Miss Kitazato filled her place efficiently for half the school year. She also, from that time, kindly interpreted for me in my Bible and children's classes. Miss Kitazato became a Christian in less than a year after she joined the Institute. She had no advantage of being in the Christian household of a cousin. Her natural character is strong and beautiful. I wrote you how she daily washed the feet of the six or seven little orphans, who were suffering terribly from suppurated chilblains, while the old matron was in the hospital last February. Her fiancé is a Christian minister of the Congregational Church, who has studied six years in America and one at Edinburgh University, and is a Ph.D., and a very earnest, hard worker. She will make a true home for her husband: for, besides her education and her disposition, she knows how to do everything about a Japanese house, even to spinning and weaving. I have met him once, and he seemed so truly a Christian gentleman that I feel sure he singing, and a few pupils on the organ to teach. She can teach English now, better than many of the native teachers in the government schools. Miss Kitazato's mantle has fallen upon her in the little Sunday class at my house, and she is very kind and helpful in many ways, and very anxious to do all she can for the church and asylum and school."

These young women, thus ably equipped and consecrated to the work before them, are but the forerunners of a host of other youthful Japanese ladies, who are in training under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal Mission in Japan, and whose services will some day add lustre to the triumphs of Christianity and a lasting glory to their native land.

PERSIAN RELIGIOUS FANATICISM.

In a letter from Teheran, Rev. J. L. Potter writes to the "Presbyterian Observer": "Religious processions go in the streets, at times when all the bazaars are strictly closed, and the devotees lash and cut themselves, sometimes in a fearful manner. It is deemed prudent for non-Moslems to keep out of the way as much as possible on these occasions. I once, however, met a procession on the streets of Teheran. Though it be admitted that some of the blood may have been obtained from the butcher shops; and though they sometimes use little half-globes of hardwood, four or five inches in diameter, which they strike together instead of beating their breasts, still there was enough of real self-torture to make it a sickening sight. It is said, indeed, that these excesses are not approved by his Imperial Majesty the Shah, and are frowned upon by the more intelligent of the Persians; still it goes on year by year, and serves to keep up the bigotry and intolerance of the Moslems in Persia. When witnessing such scenes one's spirit is "stirred in him" somewhat like Paul when he beheld the Athenians wholly given to idolatry. When will these deluded people learn that no sorrow or tears over the sufferings of martyrs in the past, no penance or self-torture, will avail for the forgiveness of sins! O, that they would receive and believe the Gospel, and find Christ Jesus made unto them "wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption."

FEEDING BROOKLYN'S POOR.

The relief work among the poor of Brooklyn is being actively pushed. Dr. Talmage's "Beef and Bread Fund," which began its work of charity two weeks ago, has greatly widened its field and is demonstrating, in still larger measure, "the shortest way for a loaf of bread from the bakery to the hungry mouth." Contributions from many quarters have been received, and during the week 10,000 more loaves of fresh bread were distributed than in the previous week. It was found that bread was more acceptable than anything else to the hungry applicants, many of whom had no fire to cook meat. The crowds that flocked to the bakery every day were larger than ever and their appreciation of the fact, that immediate relief was granted to all without questions or conditions, was expressed in their thankful exclamations as they carried off loaves, under arms or in baskets or wrapped in paper, to the waiting little ones in their cheerless homes.

ONE BY ONE.*

ONE by one the sands are flowing,
One by one the moments fall;
Some are coming, some are going;
Do not strive to grasp them all.

One by one thy duties wait thee,
Let thy whole strength go to each,
Let no future dreams elate thee,
Learn thou first what these can teach.

One by one (bright gifts from heaven)
Joys are sent thee here below;
Take them readily when given,
Ready too to let them go.

One by one thy griefs shall meet thee,
Do not fear an armed band;
One will fade as others greet thee;
Shadows passing through the land.

Do not look at life's long sorrow;
See how small each moment's pain,
God will help thee for to-morrow,
So each day begin again.

Every hour that fleets so slowly
Has its task to do or bear;
Luminous the crown, and holy,
When each gem is set with care.

Do not linger with regretting,
Or for passing hours despond;
Nor, the daily toil forgetting,
Look too eagerly beyond.

Hours are golden links, God's token,
Reaching heaven; but one by one Take them, lest the chain be broken
Ere the pilgrimage be done.

FAITH'S CROWN.
O GOD, the Rock of Ages,
Who evermore hast been,
What time the tempest rages,
Our dwelling-place serene;
Before thy first creations,
O Lord, the same as now,
To endless generations
The everlasting thou.

Our years are like the shadows
On sunny hills that lie,
Or grasses in the meadows
That blossom but to die:
A sleep, a dream, a story,
By strangers quickly told,
An unremaining glory
Of things that soon are old.

Lord, crown our faith's endeavor
With beauty and with grace,
Till, clothed in light forever,
We see thee face to face.
A joy no language measures;
A fountain brimming o'er:
An endless flow of pleasures:
An ocean without shore.

WHITTIER'S IDEA OF FAME.
Writing her reminiscences of the beloved Whittier, in "McClure's Magazine," Charlotte F. Bates tells the following characteristic incident: I remember once telling F. Whittier of something that had been said as to the permanence of his work by the late Dr. Hudson, the Shakespearian scholar. Whittier replied: "I am glad so competent an authority favors my regards to my writings. But it isn't much matter whether they live longer or shorter. They have brought me dear friends while I live, and that is enough, and I am very grateful for it." In 1881 he wrote: "I send thee my little book. . . I don't know of any reason I had for publishing it, save a yearning sire to speak to my friends once more."
Referring to desire for fame: "I had it longest," he said, in the same letter, when I had no hope of it; and what I have gained has its drawbacks in the uncom-fortableness of notoriety, in the necessity keeping up to the standard of one's reputation, and, most of all, in the feeling that you don't really deserve what you get—at, unwittingly, you pass for more than you are worth. If ever I feel like envying any one, it is not the world-famous author, but some serene, devout soul who has made a life of Christ his own, and whose will the divine will." What a beautiful revelation of his devout soul, found in the very person of a world-famous author!

THE WORD SPREAD ABROAD.
The remarkable Bible revival in America just now finding an antipodean echo in central Africa. The "Missionary Herald" says: "On the twelfth of June last eighty-nine boxes were despatched from London containing 1,511 complete copies of the New Testament. 5,170 volumes containing the four Gospels and the Acts, 496 containing Paul's Epistles, and finally 25,880 separate copies of the Gospels and of the Acts. The cost of printing, packing, and sending to Zanzibar, amounting to more than $2,000, was met by the Bible Society. The cost of transport from Zanzibar to Uganda, which could be $50 per box, was charged to the ganda Mission. And all this for a Central African tribe, a few years ago unknown, who will buy and read God's word translated in their own language, and with such intrinsic eagerness as has necessitated the richest rules regulating the sale." Who will assert in view of these and similar facts that other unevangelized parts of the globe that the Word is not fulfilling the mission hereunto it was sent?

condition of that people. One glance of your eye will inform you where the Bible is,
and where it is not. Go to Italy: decay, degradation, suffering, meet you on every side. Commerce droops, agriculture sickens, the useful arts languish. There is a heaviness in the air; you feel cramped by some invisible power; the people dare not speak aloud; they walk slowly; an armed soldier is around their dwellings; the armed police take from the stranger his Bible, before he enters the territory. Ask for the Bible in the book stores: it is not there, or in a form so large and expensive as to be beyond the reach of the common people. The preacher taire. But pass over the Alps into Switzerland, and down the Rhine into Holland, and over the Channel to England and Scotland, and what an amazing contrast meets the eye! Men look with an air of independence; there are industry, neatness, instruction for children. Why this difference? There is no brighter sky; there are no fairer scenes of nature; but they have the Bible. And happy are the people in such a case; for it is righteousness that exalteth a nation.

You'll have to Insist,
sometimes, upon getting Pearline.
Otherwise, grocers may give you some poor imitation of it, which pays them a larger profit, but which it will not pay you to use.

It isn't enough to order Pearline. See that you get it. It has grown into favor so rapidly that it has not only brought out a host of imitations, but it has led people to call any powdered soap, washing-powder, or so-called washing compound—anything in the way of a powder for cleansing purposes—Pearline. This is all very flattering to Pearline, but if it's these imitations that you've used, you can't be enthusiastic.

ARCTIC SOCK

CAN YOU MAKE A COST MARK?
It will take some time and trouble, but if you succeed you are SURE TO WIN A PRIZE.

A cost mark is a symbol, a word or number of words used by business houses to secretly inform their salesmen either the cost of certain articles or the lowest price the salesman may accept. Taking only such cost marks as consist of one or more letters, we find it should consist of ten different letters, one for each number. Thus:

C U L M I N A T E S
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0

Now suppose an article I sell cost $2.45; I put on the tag attached to it, cost UMI; if $6.20, NUS; if 37 cents, LA; and so on. A good cost mark, therefore, should consist of ten letters, all different, forming a word or words easily remembered.

We offer CASH PRIZES
as follows for the best cost mark sent us:

- For the best cost mark made according to the above description, $50.00 Cash.
- For the next best, $10.00 Cash.
- For the next best, $10.00 worth of Books.
- For the next five best, $5.00 worth of Books.
- For the next ten best, $3.00 worth of Books.
- For the next twenty best, $3.00 worth of Books.

For every correct cost mark sent us not winning one of the above prizes, a pretty leatherette purse and card case.

Conditions of contest:

- Every cost mark must consist of ten letters, as described, and must be sent in a letter, marked on the envelope "Cost Mark Contest," The Whole Family, 196 Summer St., Boston.
- Each contestant may send in only one cost mark, written on one side of the paper only. Contest closes March 1st, and cost marks received after that date will not be counted.
- All books are to be selected from Estes & Lan-riat's catalogue of their own publications, and the transportation on all prizes must be paid by recipient.
- With your cost mark you must enclose 75 cents, postal note or money order, to pay for a years subscription to

THE FRIEND OF THE HOMELESS.

ev. Stephen Merritt's Great Work Among the Destitute in New York—Feeding Crowds of Famishing Men at the Eighth Avenue Mission Hall before Daylight every Morning, and Supplying the Hungry Mothers and Children in the Afternoon.

THE EIGHTH AVENUE MISSION.

ast army of the helpless poor, who for weeks to come, must face the blasts of winter, and unhoused.

Among the many agencies now actively engaged in relieving the most urgent form of suffering—the pangs of hunger and cold—that of the Eighth Avenue Mission, established by Rev. Stephen Merritt, at Nos. 208 and 210 Eighth Avenue, New York, is the most unique, and stands as convincing demonstration of the fact that in such times as these, the true principle of charitable work should be “unconditional and immediate relief.” Nearly 2,000 starving souls have been fed daily, for weeks past, and the great tide of hungry humanity is still pouring in, with an appeal upon its lips that cannot be denied. This is a herculean work for one man to undertake, and yet it is what Stephen Merritt has been doing, almost unaided. It is a battle against hunger such as has never before been fought, either in New York or any other city of this Continent, and one to which he has consecrated his own means and trusted to Divine Providence for the result.

Many readers of the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember our publication, a year ago, of the history of “The Travelers’ Club,” which had then been recently founded by Mr. Merritt, and which was an outgrowth of his Eighth Avenue Mission in New York City. A long experience in philanthropic work had brought the veteran preacher into contact with suffering humanity in every stage and degree of wretchedness and destitution. He had been made especially to feel for the thousands of homeless unemployed in our larger cities, who were drifting about like waifs on the great ocean of misery and want, with none to help. At different times, he had been chosen as the instrument, under Providence, of uplifting and restoring many of these down-trodden and helpless souls to a new manhood, and of leading them to Him in whose hands is fullness of blessing, here and hereafter. “The Travelers’ Club,” at the outset, was composed of the poorest, lowest, and most wretched unfortunates, who assembled in the large hall of the Eighth Avenue Mission, between five and seven o’clock every morning, and were refreshed with a wholesome and abundant meal of meat, bread and fragrant coffee. All were welcome, regardless of nationality, color, or creed; it sufficed that the wanderer was hungry; he needed no other credentials to be admitted to full membership in “The Travelers’ Club.”

Stephen Merritt himself was caterer; he did their own cooking, and cleaning up. “chef” — whose coffee way-worn members unanimously pronounced delicious—was the Club and nothing was there an organization a better feeling prevail and benevolence shone the good-hearted found-

ets, kitchen, and dining-room, and all well lighted, warmed and ventilated—the ideal place where a poor, homeless, hungry fellow, tired from tramping the hard sidewalks in the never-ending search for work, might find an hour or two of solid comfort and catch a bit of sleep after his strengthening meal. While they ate, their genial host talked to them of the better life in such a way that no member of the Club could be offended. Many a forlorn waif there learned to lay his burden of care and despondency upon Him who hath promised to give rest to “the weary and heavily-laden,” if they will only come to Him, and no less than seventy accepted the

THE BARE ARM OF GOD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Text: Isaiah 52: 10: "The Lord hath made bare His holy arm."

IT almost takes our breath away to read some of the Bible imagery. There is such boldness of metaphor in my text that I have been for some time getting my courage up to preach from it. Isaiah, the evangelistic prophet, is sounding the Jubilate of our planet redeemed, and cries out, "The Lord hath made bare his holy arm." What overwhelming suggestiveness in that figure of speech, "The bare arm of God!" The people of Palestine to this day wear much hindering apparel, and when they want to run a special race, or lift a special burden, or fight a special battle, they put off the outside apparel, as in our land, when a man proposes a special exertion, he puts off his coat and rolls up his sleeves. Walk through our foundries, our machine-shops, our mines, our factories, and you will find that most of the toilers have their coat off, and their sleeve rolled up.

Isaiah saw that there must be a tremendous amount of work done before this world becomes what it ought to be, and he foresees it all accomplished, and accomplished by the Almighty; not as we ordinarily think of him, but by the Almighty with the sleeve of his robe rolled back to his shoulder: "The Lord hath made bare his holy arm."

Nothing more impresses me in the Bible than the ease with which God does most things. There is such a reserve of power. He has more thunderbolts than he has ever flung; more light than he has ever distributed; more blue than that with which he has over-arched the sky; more green than that with which he has emeralded the grass; more crimson than that with which he has burnished the sunsets. I say it with reverence: from all I can see, God has never half tried.

You know as well as I do that many of the most elaborate and expensive industries of our world have been employed in creating artificial light. Half of the time the world is dark. The moon and the stars have their glorious uses, but as instruments of illumination they are failures. They will not allow you to read a book, or stop the rufianism of your great cities. Had not the darkness been persistently fought back by artificial means, the most of the world's enterprises would have halted half the time, while the crime of our great municipalities would for half the time run rampant and unrebuked. Hence, all the inventions for creating artificial light, from the flint struck against steel in centuries past, to the dynamo of our electrical manufacturing. What uncounted numbers of people at work the year round in making chandeliers, and lamps, and fixtures, and wires, and batteries where light shall be made, or along which light shall run, or where light shall pulse! How many bare arms of human toil—and some of those bare arms are very tired—in the creation of light and its apparatus; and after all the work, the greater part of the continents and hemispheres at night have no light at all, except perhaps the fire-flies flashing their small lanterns across the swamp.

But see how easily God made the light. He did not make bare his arm; he did not even put forth his robed arm; he did not lift so much as a finger. The flint out of which he struck the noonday sun was the word, "Light." "Let there be light!" Adam did not see the sun until the fourth day, for, though the sun was created on the first day, it took its rays from the first to the fourth day to work through the dense mass of fluids by which this earth was compassed. Did you ever hear of anything so easy as that? So unique? Out of a word came the blazing sun, the father of flowers, and warmth, and light? Out of a word building a fire-place for all the nations of the earth to warm themselves by! Yea, seven other worlds, five of them inconceivably larger than our own, and seventy-nine asteroids, or worlds on a smaller scale! The warmth and light for this great brotherhood, great sisterhood, great family of worlds, eighty-seven larger or smaller worlds, all from that one magnificent fire-place made out of the one word,—"Light." The sun 886,000 miles in diameter. I do not know how much grander a solar system God could have created if he had put forth his robed arm, to say nothing of an arm made bare! But this I know: that our noonday sun was a spark struck from the anvil of one word, and that word—"Light."

"But," says some one, "do you not think that in making the machinery of the universe, of which our solar system is comparatively a small wheel working into mightier wheels, it must have cost God some exertion? The upheaval of an arm, either robed, or an arm made bare?" No; we are distinctly told otherwise. The machinery of a universe God made simply with his fingers. David, inspired in a night song, says so: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers."

A Scottish clergyman told me a few weeks ago of dyspeptic Thomas Carlyle walking out with a friend one starry night, and as the friend looked up and said, "What a splendid sky!" Mr. Carlyle replied, as he glanced upward, "Sad sight, sad sight!" Not so thought David as he read the great scripture of the night heavens. It was a sweep of embroidery, of vast tapestry, God manipulated. That is the allusion of the Psalmist to the woven hangings of tapestry, as they were known long before David's time. Far back in the ages what enchantment of thread and color, the Florentine velvets of silk and gold and Persian carpets woven of goat's hair! If you have been in the Gobelin manufactory of tapestry in Paris—alas! now no more—you witnessed wondrous things, as you saw the wooden needle or broach, going back and forth in and out; you were transfixed with admiration at the patterns wrought. No wonder that Louis XIV. bought it and it became the possession of the throne; and for a long while none but thrones and palaces might have any of its work! What triumphs of loom! What victory of skilled fingers! So David says of the heavens, that God's fingers wove into them the light; that God's fingers tapestried them with stars; that God's fingers embroidered them with worlds. How much of the immensity of the heavens David understood I know not. Astronomy was born in China twenty-eight hundred years before Christ was born. During the reign of Hoang-Ti, astronomers were put to death if they made wrong calculations about the heavens. Job understood the refraction of the sun's rays, and said they were "turned as the clay to the seal." The pyramids were astronomical observatories, and they were so long ago built that Isaiah refers to one of them in his nineteenth chapter, and calls it the "Pillar at the border." The first of all the sciences born was astronomy. Whether from knowledge already abroad, or from direct inspiration, it seems to me David had wide knowledge of the heavens. Whether he understood the full force of what he wrote, I know not; but the God who inspired him knew, and he would not let David write anything but truth; and therefore all the worlds that the telescope ever reached, or Copernicus, or Galileo, or Kepler, or Newton, or Laplace, or Herschel, or our own Mitchell ever saw were so easily made that they were made with the fingers. As easily as with your fingers you mould the wax, or the clay, or the dough to particular shapes, so he decided the shape of our world, and that it should weigh six sextillion tons, and appointed for all worlds their orbits and decided their color—the white to Sirius; the ruddy to Aldebaran; the yellow to Pollux; the blue to Altair; marrying some of the stars, as the 2,400 double stars that Herschel observed; administering to the whims of the variable stars as their glance becomes brighter or dim, preparing what astronomers called, "The girdle of Andromeda," and the nebula in the sword-handle of Orion. Worlds on worlds! Worlds under worlds! Worlds above worlds! Worlds beyond worlds! So many that arithmetics are of no use in the calculation! But he counted them as he made them, and he made them with his fingers! Reservation of power! Suppression of Omnipotence! Resources as yet untouched! Almightiness yet undemonstrated! Now I ask, for the benefit of all disheartened Christian workers, if God accomplished so much with his fingers, what can he do when he puts out all his strength? And when he unlimbers all the batteries of his Omnipotence? The Bible speaks again and again of God's outstretched arm, but only once, and that in the text, of the bare arm of God.

My text makes it plain that the rectification of this world is a stupendous undertaking. It takes more power to make this world over again than it took to make it at first. A word was only necessary for the first creation, but for the new creation the unsleeved and unhindered forearm of the Almighty! The reason of that I can understand. In the ship-yards of Liverpool, or Glasgow, or New York, a great vessel is constructed. The architect draws out the plan, the length of the beam, the capacity of tonnage, the rotation of wheel or screw, the cabins, the masts and all the appointments of this great palace of the deep. The architect finishes his work without any perplexity, and the carpenters and the artisans toil on the craft so many hours a day, each one doing his part, until, with flags flying, and thousands of people huzzaing on the docks, the vessel is launched. But out on the sea that steamer breaks her shatt, and is limping slowly along toward harbor, when Caribbean whirlwinds, those mighty hunters of the deep, looking out for prey of ships, surround that wounded vessel and pitch it on a rocky coast, and she lifts and falls in the breakers until every joint is loose, and every spar is down, and every wave sweeps over the hurricane deck as she parts midships. Would it not require more skill and power to get that splintered vessel off the rocks and reconstruct it than it required originally to build her? Aye! Our world that God built so beautiful, and which started out with all the flags of Edenic foliage and with the chant of Paradisaical bowers, has been sixty centuries pounding in the Skerries of sin and sorrow, and to get her out, and to get her off, and to get her on the right way again, will require more of Omnipotence than it required to build her and launch her. So I am not surprised that though in the dry-dock of one word our world was made, it will take the unsleeved arm of God to lift her from the rocks and put her on the right course again. It is evident from my text, and its comparison with other texts, that it would not be so great an undertaking to make a whole constellation of worlds, and a whole galaxy of worlds, and a whole astronomy of worlds, and swing them in their right orbits, as to take this wounded world, this stranded world, this bankrupt world, this destroyed world, and make it as good as when it started.

Now, just look at the enthroned difficulties in the way, the removal of which, the overthrow of which seem to require the bare right arm of Omnipotence. There stands heathenism, with its 860,000,000 victims. I do not care whether you call them Brahmins, or Buddhists, Confucians or Fetish idolaters. At the World's Fair in Chicago last summer those monstrosities of religion tried to make themselves respectable, but the long hair and baggy trousers and tinkered robes of their representatives cannot hide from the world the fact that those religions are the authors of funeral pyre, and Juggernaut crushing, and Ganges infanticide, and Chinese shoe torture, and the aggregated massacres of many centuries. They have their heels on India, on China, on Persia, on Borneo, on three-fourths of the acreage of our poor old world. I know that the missionaries, who are the most sacrificing and Christ-like men and women on earth, are making steady and glorious inroads upon these built-up abominations of the centuries. All this stuff that you see in some of the newspapers about the missionaries as living in luxury and idleness is promulgated by corrupt American or English or Scotch merchants, whose loose behavior in heathen cities has been rebuked by the missionaries, and these corrupt merchants write home or tell innocent and unsuspecting visitors in India or China or the darkened islands of the sea, these falsehoods about our consecrated missionaries who, turning their backs on home and civilization and emolument and comfort, spend their lives in trying to introduce the mercy of the Gospel among the down-trodden of heathenism. Some of those merchants leave their families in America or England or Scotland, and stay for a few years in the ports of heathenism while they are making their fortunes in the tea or rice or opium trade, and while they are thus absent from home, give themselves to orgies of dissoluteness, such as no pen or tongue could, without the abolition of all decency, attempt to report. The presence of the missionaries with their pure and noble households in those heathen ports, is a constant rebuke to such debauches and miscreants. If Satan should visit heaven, from which he was once roughly, but justly, expatriated, and he should write home to the realms pandemoniac, his correspondence published in Diabolos Gazette, or Apollyonic News, about what he had seen, he would report the Temple of God and the Lamb as a broken-down church, and the House of Many Mansions as a disreputable place, and the Cherubim as suspicious of morals. Sin never did like Holiness, and you had better not depend upon Satanic report of the sublime and multipotent work of our missionaries in foreign lands. But notwithstanding all that these men and women of God have achieved, they feel, and we all feel that if the idolatrous lands are to be Christianized, there needs to be a power from the heavens that has not yet condescended, and we feel like crying out in the words of Charles Wesley:

Arm of the Lord, awake, awake,

Put on Thy strength, the nations shake!

Aye, it is not only the Lord's arm that is needed, the holy arm, the outstretched arm, but the bare arm!

There, too, stands Mohammedanism, with its 176,000,000 victims. Its Bible is the Koran, a book not quite as large as our New Testament, which was revealed to Mohammed when in epileptic fits, and resuscitated from these fits, he dictated it to scribes. Yet it is read to-day by more people than any other book ever written. Mohammed, the founder of that religion, a polygamist, with superfluity of wives, the first step of his religion on the body, mind and soul of woman, and no wonder that the heaven of the Koran is an everlasting Sodom, an infinite seraglio, about which Mohammed promises that each follower shall have in that place seventy-two wives, in addition to all the wives he had on earth, but that no old woman shall ever enter heaven. When a Bishop of England recently proposed that the best way of saving Mohammedans was to let them keep their religion, but engraft upon it some new principles from Christianity, he perpetrated an ecclesiastical joke, at which no man can laugh, who has ever seen the tyranny and domestic wretchedness which always appear where that religion gets foothold. It has marched across continents, and now proposes to set up its filthy and accursed banner in America, and what it has done for Turkey, it would like to do for our nation. A religion that brutally treats womanhood ought never to be fostered in our country. But there never was a religion so absurd or wicked that it did not get disciples, and there are enough fools in America to make a large discipleship of Mohammedanism. This corrupt religion has been making steady progress for hundreds of years, and notwithstanding all the splendid work done by the Jessups, and the Goodells, and the Blisses and the Van Dykes and the Posts and the Misses Bowens and the Misses Thompsons, and scores of other men and women of whom the world was not worthy, there it stands, the giant of sin, Mohammedanism, with one foot on the heart of woman, and the other on the heart of Christ, while it mumbles from its minarets this stupendous blasphemy: "God is great, and Mohammed is his prophet." Let the Christian printing-presses at Beyrout and Constantinople keep on with their work, and the men and women of God in the mission fields toil until the Lord crowns them, but what we are all hoping for is something supernatural from the heavens, as yet unseen, something stretched down out of the skies, something like an arm uncovered, the bare arm of the God of Nations!

There stands also the Arch Demon of alcoholism. Its throne is white, and made of bleached human skulls. On one side of that throne of skulls kneels in obeisance and worship, Democracy, and on the other side Republicanism, and the one that kisses the cancerous and gangrened foot of this despot the oftenest gets the most benedictions. There is a Hudson River, an Ohio, a Mississippi of strong drink rolling through this nation, but as the rivers from which I take my figure of speech empty into the Atlantic or the Gulf, this mightier flood of sickness, and insanity, and domestic ruin, and crime, and bankruptcy, and woe, empties into the hearts, and the homes, and the churches, and the time and the eternity of a multitude beyond all statistics to number or describe. All nations are mauled and scarified with baleful stimulus, or killing narcotic. The pulque of Mexico, the cashew of Brazil, the Hasheesh of Persia, the opium of China, the guavo of Honduras, the wedro of Russia, the soma of India, the aguardiente of Morocco, the arak of Arabia, the mastic of Syria, the rakı of Turkey, the beer of Germany, the whiskey of Scotland, the ale of England, the all-drinks of America are doing their best to stupefy, inflame, dement, impoverish, brutalize and slay the human race. Human power unless reinforced from the heavens can never extirpate the evils I mention.

Much good has been accomplished by the heroism and fidelity of Christian reformers, but the fact remains that there are more splendid men and magnificent women this moment going over the Niagara abyss of inebriety than at any time since the first grape was turned into wine, and the first head of rye began to soak in a brewery. When people touch this subject they are apt to give statistics as to how many millions are in drunkards' graves, or with quick tread marching on toward them. The land is full of talk of High Tariff and Low Tariff, but what about the highest of all Tariffs in this country, the Tariff of nine hundred million dollars which Rum put upon the United States in 1891, for that is what it cost us. You do not tremble or turn pale when I say that. The fact is we have become hardened by statistics and they make little impression. But if some one could gather into one mighty lake all the tears that have been wrung out of orphanage and widowhood; or into one organ diapason all the groans that have been uttered by the suffering victims of this holocaust; or into one whirlwind all the sighs of centuries of dissipation; or from the wicket of one immense prison have look upon us the glaring eyes of all those whom strong drink has endurged, we might perhaps realize the appalling desolation. But, no, no, the sight would forever blast our vision; the sound would forever stun our souls. Go on with your temperance literature; go on with your temperance platforms; go on with your temperance laws. But we are all hoping for something from above, and while the bare arm of suffering, and the bare arm of invalidism, and the bare arm of poverty, and the bare arm of domestic desolation, from which rum hath torn the sleeve, are lifted up in beggary and supplication and despair, let the bare arm of God strike the breweries, and the liquor stores, and the corrupt politics, and the license laws, and the whole inferno of grog-shops all around the world. Down, thou accursed Bottle, from the Throne! Into the dust, thou king of the Demijohn! Parched be thy lips, thou Wine presence of expectant nations, and flashing his omniscient eyes across the work to be done, will put back the sleeve of his right arm to the shoulder, and roll it up there, and for the world's final and complete rescue make bare his arm. Who can doubt the result when according to my text Jehovah does his best: when the last reserve force of Omnipotence takes the field; when the last sword of Eternal Might leaps from its scabbard. Do you know what decided the battle of Sedan? The hills a thousand feet high. Eleven hundred cannon on the hills. Artillery on the heights of Givonne, and twelve German batteries on the heights of La Moncello. The Crown Prince of Saxony watched the scene from the heights of Mairy. Between a quarter to six o'clock in the morning and one o'clock in the afternoon of September 2nd, 1870, the hills dropped the shells that shattered the French host in the valley. The French Emperor and the 86,000 of his army captured by the hills. So in this conflict now raging between holiness and sin "our eyes are unto the hills." Down here in the valleys of earth we must be valiant soldiers of the Cross, but the Commander of our host walks the heights, and views the scene far better than we can in the valleys, and at the right day and the right hour all heaven will open its batteries cup, with fires that shall never be quenched!

But I have no time to specify the manifold evils that challenge Christianity. And I think I have seen in some Christians, and read in some newspapers, and heard from some pulpits, a disheartenment, as though Christianity were so worsted that it is hardly worth while to attempt to win this world for God, and that all Christian work would collapse, and that it is no use for you to teach a Sabbath-class, or distribute tracts, or exhort in prayer-meetings, or preach in a pulpit, as Satan is gaining ground. To rebuke that pessimism, the Gospel of Smash-up, I preach this sermon, showing that you are on the winning side. Go ahead! Fight on! What I want to make out to-day is that our ammunition is not exhausted; that all which has been accomplished has been only the skirmishing before the great Armageddon; that not more than one of the thousand fountains of beauty in the King's Park has begun to play; that not more than one brigade of the innumerable hosts to be marshalled by the Rider on the White Horse has yet taken the field; that what God has done yet has been with arm folded in flowing robe; but that the time is coming when he will rise from his throne, and throw off that robe, and come out of the palaces of eternity, and come down the stairs of heaven with all-conquering step, and halt in the on our side, and the commander of the hosts of unrighteousness with all his followers will surrender, and it will take eternity to fully celebrate the universal victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. "Our eyes are unto the hills." It is so certain to be accomplished that Isaiah in my text looks down through the field-glass of prophecy, and speaks of it as already accomplished, and I take my stand where the prophet took his stand, and look at it as all done. "Hallelujah, 'tis done." See! Those cities without a tear! Look! Those continents without a pang! Behold! Those hemispheres without a sin! Why, those deserts, Arabian desert, American desert, and Great Sahara desert, are all irrigated into gardens where God walks in the cool of the day. The atmosphere that encircles our globe floating not one groan. All the rivers and lakes and oceans dimpled with not one falling tear. The climates of the earth have dropped out of them the rigors of the cold and the blasts of the heat, and it is universal Spring! Let us change the old world's name. Let it no more be called the Earth, as when it was reeking with everything pestiferous and malevolent, scarlet with battle-fields and gashed with graves, but now so changed, so aromatic with gardens, and so resonant with song, and so rubescent with beauty, let us call it Immanuel's

Land, or Beulah, or Millennial Gardens, or Paradise Regained, or Heaven! And to God the only Wise, the only Good, the only Great, be glory forever. Amen.

The Gospel in the Mountains.

Louis Reinhardt's Experiment Among the Poor Whites and Crackers of Georgia, and How it has been Blessed.

HERE is probably no class of people in the United States who enjoy fewer of the advantages of civilization than the poor mountain whites and "Crackers" of some of our Southern states. Philanthropic effort and Gospel crusade alike seem to have overlooked them, and while the energies of Christian churches and other organizations are striving for the evangelization of almost every other section of the country, this particular class has been greatly neglected.

Some years ago, Louis Reinhardt, a pioneer settler in the mountains of Georgia, resolved to attempt the education of his own family. He saw other little ones growing up to manhood and womanhood in ignorance. He began to teach a few young people in a little two-room school and soon other families living on the mountains, hearing of his experiment, begged the privilege of sending their children to be taught. At first there were only seven scholars; but in an amazingly short time, the experiment begun by Reinhardt attained such proportions that the large number of pupils could no longer be taught by a single teacher unaided, so the best available help was secured. The little school has since then branched out to the dimensions of a great institution and now three hundred students are under the educational care of a regular faculty, whose members initiate them into the mysteries of moral and mental science. English literature, Latin and Greek, book-keeping, art, physical culture and all the departments to be found in an ordinary collegiate institution.

Naturally, the experiment and its success have aroused the interest and attention of the entire state, and many of the leading men and women of Georgia have given it their warmest commendation and support. The Georgia Legislature has chartered the school to do regular collegiate work, and it now gives every promise of becoming a great educational and christianizing influence. Mr. Reinhardt's daughter recently deeded to the college some valuable grounds, and plans have been made for the erection of new buildings. An effort is also being made to raise a fund which will enable the institution still further to extend its operations. It is, at the present time, the only college in eleven counties. The ladies of the State have responded to the appeal for aid, and Governor Northen, who is warmly interested in the work, has given it his strongest commendation, as an agency that promises well for the future of that part of the South.

Besides the educational aspect of the work, the Reinhardt College is exercising a marked religious influence upon a very large section of country, which has hitherto enjoyed very few religious privileges. Many of its students are studying for the ministry and hope some time in the near future to devote themselves to the spread of the gospel of Jesus Christ throughout their native State. The "Crackers" of Georgia are people who have been known in the past as exceedingly illiterate and unspiritual, and any work that will bring them within the scope of religious teaching deserves to be commended and sustained. Any of our readers who may feel an interest in this particular work, can address Prof. C. E. Pattillo, President, Walesca, Ga.

To show how very necessary such a work as this is in Georgia, it may be explained that of 604,971 children of six years and upward, in the State, 114,577 cannot read or write, and 10,701 have never been to school. There are thousands of adults and many more thousands of children, who are as ignorant of the Gospel as of books, and the influence of moral and intellectual training on the rising generation is one whose value cannot be estimated.

WHY HOME MISSIONS SUFFER.

The general business depression is affecting the receipts of the religious societies. The Congregational Home Missionary Society states that its receipts for the first nine months of the current year were $100,000 less than those of the corresponding months of the previous year. This means a decrease of thirty-five per cent. The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions reports that up to December 1st, 1892, receipts were $125,539 less than for the corresponding period of 1892.

BEGINNING OF THE NATION.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 4. Gen. 12: 1-9. Golden Text, Gen. 12: 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE earth was cleansed by the flood, but man's heart remained the same as before. The descendants of Noah, even in the first generation, went astray from God and failed him. The tendency of fallen man, from the very first, had been to be independent of God. His command to Noah and his sons had been: "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth;" but man had another idea. Thinking of their own convenience and satisfaction; of that which was a gratification to themselves, irrespective of how the interests of God might be affected by it, they said one to another: "Let us make bricks and burn them thoroughly . . . let us build us a city and a tower whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the earth" (Gen. 12: 4). That is to say: Let us defend ourselves against the will of God; let us bind ourselves together to frustrate his purpose of bringing the earth under cultivation and subduing it. Our way is better than God's way.

God's purpose is to gather together all things in Christ; man's thought is Association on Selfish Principles.

A coalition of multiplied selfishness. No principle of true unity holds it together. The people of those days had left God out of their reckoning. But in his quiet majesty he came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded. It was decided in the councils of heaven that confusion of tongues should be the weapon with which God should defeat the purposes of his rebellious creatures. Without bloodshed, without a blow, but in a way so sure that to this very day the witness of that judgment from God is upon the earth, God gained his victory; and the continuation of man with man, apart from God, was brought to a sudden termination. Witnesses for God were not wanting in those days. Shem was still alive, and was, for about a hundred and thirty years, Abraham's contemporary. Noah lived till within a year or two of the birth of Abraham; the other sons of Noah may have been still in existence, so that the judgment of the flood could hardly have been forgotten. But, safe as they knew they were, by the promise of God, from a future deluge, how could they have anticipated such an inconceivable calamity as to be unable to understand, or to make the person understand with whom they had the freest intercourse only the previous day? God conquered, and sheer necessity made them cease their building operations, and made them anxious now to travel as far off from one another as they could, that they might only have around them the few who could still understand the language which they each spoke.

But What of God's Purpose?

Adam and Eve had failed him, the flood seemed to be a failure in its results, for the posterity of Noah were no better than the posterity of Adam. Yet, "whatever God doeth, it shall be forever" (Eccl. 3: 14), and in each generation he has found one man or one little company of men, who would understand him, and enter into and carry out his purposes. There was a man of the posterity of Shem ten generations removed from Noah (for Shem lived to see nine generations of his posterity) and this man, Abraham, with his father, Terah, and all his family "served other Gods" (Josh. 24: 2), as did most men of their day.

In some way, not detailed in Scripture, God manifested himself to Abraham. It may be that in Abraham's heart had been awakened that intense hunger after God, that unsatisfied something, which is impatient with all would-be religions, which must have the real thing; a craving which is God-begotten; a something which says: God never called me into being that I might be only like the beasts which perish; if there is a God, where can I find him? It may be that the cry of his heart, moved upon by the Holy Spirit, may have gone up to God, and that consciousness of God speaking for the first time, which some of us will never forget, may have become a fact to this once idolater.

What did God say? That which put to the utmost proof this awakened soul: "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, into a land which I will show thee; and I will make thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and him that curseth thee will I curse, and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." (R. V.) It was again but on another line. God would not now destroy all the population of the world, but he would make another, a nearer and a holier covenant with one family, taken out of the population of the world. But for this purpose he must find a man loyally willing to leave all for him, one who would choose God before all else, and continue faithful. Abraham's call included the loss of all which could afford him personal satisfaction; it put him to the proof. Like Noah, he must become a man separated and misunderstood by his generation in responding to this call of God.

We are not told that he even weighed the matter: God had spoken, this was enough for him; and "Abram went as the Lord had spoken to him." Instant.

Unquestioning Obedience

as soon as the will of God is known to them, characterizes the true sons and daughters of Abraham; the generation of the faithful, the true elect of God. God was about to call out one family from among men which should never in any age lose its character, its name, its individuality; and the real as well as typical head of that family, must be a man apart from other men. Nearly four thousand years have elapsed; nations have risen and fallen, races of man have arisen and perished, or been absorbed; but Abraham's seed remains the same. In America, Englishmen, Germans, French, Swedes, Russians after one or two generations become Americans; but the Israelites in America is an American Jew. The nations of Europe absorb those of other lands who intermarry or settle amongst them; but a German Jew, a Polish Jew, a Russian Jew, a Spanish Jew, are household words. "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob the lot of his inheritance." (Deut. 32: 8, 9). From this very chapter, (Gen. 12) which we are now considering the whole book treats of the family of Abraham. The other four books of Moses tell exclusively their history, with God's marvellous interventions and the laws given direct from God to this one chosen race of men. Joshua and Judges, carry on the history, and the book of Ruth, although treating of a Gentile gives her history because she comes into the genealogy of the royal race of David, the books of Samuel, of the Kings and Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther, relate the further history of this same race, and God's dealing with them. Job is an exception; then the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, were all written by Jewish authors, all the prophets of the Old Testament, and all the writers in the New, were Jews. When the Son of God himself came down on earth, even he took on him the seed of Abraham.

The Jew too, God's first Israel has failed, as Adam's posterity and Noah's had failed, the Jew did not appreciate his Son; and therefore God has another "remnant according to the election of grace;" and is now taking out from the nations, among whom the Jews failed as a witness, "a people for his name." And when this purpose is accomplished, Christ will come a second time "time to them that look for him without sin unto salvation," and those who have overcome, as he overcame, will sit down with him upon his throne, as he is set down with his Father in his throne. Then the promises of earthly prosperity made to the Jews, shall be fully accomplished; they shall be the head and not the tail; "all the people of the earth shall see that they are called by the name of the Lord, and shall be afraid of them." (Deut. 28: 10, 13).

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE journey of Abraham is believed to have been made about 1921 years before Christ and about 490 years before his descendants, under Moses, crossed the Red Sea. His father, Terah, who was descended from Noah's son, Shem, had been living at Ur of the Chaldees, a city formerly on the shores of the Persian Gulf. The water has receded from the locality now, leaving it nearly a hundred miles from the sea. The city has been uncovered recently, and when the sands which had covered it for centuries were removed, something was learned of the character of its people. They were idolaters of the worst type, their very worship being immorality of the most gross and sensual kind. Terah had two sons beside Abraham. Of these, one, Haran, died there, leaving one son, Lot, and two daughters, Milcah, who married her uncle, Nahor, and Iscah, who is believed to be identical with Sarah, who married Abraham. Terah, with his son, Abraham, and his grandson, Lot, left the city and went to Haran, near the modern Aleppo. Nahor, Terah's other son, is not mentioned in the narrative of the migration. He may have remained behind, but if he did, he followed afterward, for he was in the neighborhood of Haran sixty years later, when Abraham sent his servant to him to get a wife for Isaac. Terah died at Haran and then Abraham quitted the neighborhood with his nephew, Lot, traveled southward three hundred miles, staying for a time near Shechem, at the oak grove of Moreh, and thence to the neighborhood of Luz, afterward called Bethel, about twelve miles north of Jerusalem.

This wandering was not begun in mere restlessness, but in obedience to God's command. How God communicated his will to Abraham we are not told. In whatever form the communication came, whether by audible voice, or by his own sense of duty, Abraham recognized it as a call from God. It meant that he should leave civilization and go into a wild country inhabited by the descendants of Ham. So the Pilgrim Fathers heard the call of God, when they left England 274 years ago to plant their new settlement on this side the Atlantic. So, in all ages, men have heard the call, bidding them quit ease and comfort and pleasant surroundings for some greater duty. So God often calls young people now to separate themselves from friends and old associates that they may serve him without interruption and without evil and contaminating influence. It is a hard and painful thing to do, but those who obey receive the blessing.

Get thee out of thy country. It is said of the Greeks that, at a certain period of their history, when their states were in danger of becoming too densely populated, they adopted an original and characteristic device to avert the evil. A number of youths of a certain age and standing were called out and set apart as the nucleus of a new nation. They were equipped with arms and supplies and were sent out to conquer a new country for themselves. In modern times the departure has been spontaneous and voluntary. America, Australia, and more recently, Africa, have attracted enterprising young men from Europe, who have gone from the crowded avenues of competition in the old world to found new empires in virgin lands. Unhappily, they have not always gone, as Abraham went and as the Pilgrim Fathers went, to serve God, but have carried the vices and passions of the old world into the new.

Departed as the Lord had spoken. To the people at Haran Abraham's course must have seemed very foolish. If asked why he was leaving and where he was going, he would be obliged to answer that he did not know where and that he was simply obeying God. Perhaps to Abraham himself the reason for his going may not have been very clear, but he obeyed implicitly. Such obedience and trust God loves to see in his children. A story is told of Gen. Havelock which illustrates this kind of obedience. Crossing London Bridge one morning with his son he suddenly thought of something he had forgotten, requiring him to return to a certain street. Leaving the boy on the bridge he told him to wait there for him. He was detained there by business and becoming absorbed forgot about his promise to the lad, and did not return to the bridge at all. When he came home late in the evening his wife asked him where Harry was. Then it flashed upon him that he had forgotten his promise. "Why, Harry is on London Bridge." One of his guests remarked that the boy would come home. "No," said Havelock, "he is a soldier's son," and leaving his guests and hastening to the spot he found him just where he had left him in the morning. The boy had waited, all the day, not once leaving the spot. His father had given him the command and the promise, and he simply obeyed.

I will bless thee. Would such a promise be a sufficient compensation to Abraham for all he was called upon to surrender? Abraham appears to have thought so. Many since his day have given up the prizes of the world with no better guarantee and not one has regretted trusting in God. William Moodie tells a story to show that even when men try to oppose God's will, they are thwarted and the blessing goes as he had promised. He says: "There were in Rome two blind men, one of whom cried in the streets of the city, 'He is helped whom God helps.' The other more diplomatically cried, 'He is helped whom the King helps.' This they did every day, and the Emperor heard of it so often, that he caused a loaf of bread to be filled with gold pieces and sent it to the man who had honored him. The beggar felt the bread, noticed how heavy it was, and, concluding that it was indigestible, offered it to the other blind beggar for a few pennies. The latter bought it, took it home, found the treasure and from that day ceased to beg. But the other continuing to beg through the city, the Emperor summoned him to his presence and asked him, 'What hast thou done with the loaf that I lately sent thee?' The man replied, 'I sold it to my friend because it was heavy and did not seem well risen.' Then the Emperor said, 'Truly he whom God helps is helped indeed,' and turned the blind man from him."

A land that I will show thee. The land was not described to Abraham at the time, but God promised to show it to him and that was enough. We know very little of what heaven is to be, but we have the same promise, and everyone who lives for that land is sure of its being a land in which he will be happy. Luther, writing to his son, painted it in colors attractive to a boy. He said, "I know a pretty, merry garden wherein there are many children. They have little golden coats and they gather beautiful apples under the trees, and pears, cherries and plums; they sing and jump and are merry. They have beautiful little horses, too, with gold bits and silver saddles. And I asked the man to whom the garden belongs whose children they were. And he said, 'They are the children who pray and love to learn and are good!' Then I said, 'Dear man! I have a son, too; his name is Johnny Luther. May he not also come into this garden and eat these beautiful apples and pears, and ride these pretty horses?' Then the man said, 'If he loves to pray and learn and is good, he shall come into this garden, and Lippius and Jost, too, and when they all come together they shall have fifes and trumpets and flutes and all sorts of music, and they shall dance and shoot with little cross-bows.' And he showed me a fine meadow there in the garden, made for dancing. There hung fine golden fifes, trumpets and silver cross-bows. And I said to the man, 'Ah, dear sir! I will immediately go and write all this to my son Johnny and tell him to pray diligently, and to learn well, and to be good, so that he also may come to this garden.'"

When, owing to the universal depression in trade, the idle and destitute have been multiplied a thousand-fold. When the snows of December began to fall, the membership of "The Travelers' Club" swelled to unheard-of proportions. Artisans of every trade, clerks, longshoremen, drivers, salesmen, factory hands, and workers formerly employed in a hundred different callings, but now idle and penniless, came there and were fed. There were many, too, who had once occupied positions of responsibility, and not a few college graduates among the number. Dire poverty, which "makes strange bed-fellows," had brought them to the same level of necessity and the Club's larder was taxed to supply them all. But Mr. Merritt resolved that no matter how many might come to be fed, none should be turned away. He flung wide the Mission doors, opening them several hours earlier than before, to admit the wanderers, and trusted the Lord to sustain the work, he meanwhile paying all the expenses out of his own pocket.

It is impossible to overestimate the good that is accomplished by this broadly Samaritan work in which Mr. Merritt is engaged. As may well be imagined, the task of feed-many are in garments that have long since seen their best days; a few are warmly and even respectably dressed, but all alike are penniless, homeless, and painfully hungry. There is no noise or clamor as they take their seats in the warm room, and wait patiently for the anticipated meal to be served. Mr. Merritt himself goes round among them as they enter, and with a nod and a kind word, makes all welcome. Most of them doze in their seats, until the call for morning prayer at about 4:30 o'clock.

It is a moving picture, when these five hundred or more destitute wanderers, thus strangely assembled in the middle of the night by one man's kindness, are served with the first food they have probably eaten in twenty-four hours. Our artist has endeavored to portray the scene, as it was photographed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few mornings ago, but the experience of a personal visit alone can convey a really adequate impression. Every man in the crowd—which is only the advance guard of others—enjoys his piping hot breakfast and each sips his quart of coffee (he can have as many mugs of it as he wishes) and eats till his hunger is satisfied. Or, if he prefers, he may have a few mugs of strong English breakfast tea instead of coffee. It would surprise most people to see the quantity of the Eighth Avenue Mission, there are hundreds of families, whose wan mothers and pinched babies are suffering for the barest necessities of life. He decided to make an effort to help them and accordingly, some time ago, he established a "Woman's Club"—in many respects the counterpart of "The Travelers' Club" and which has already been productive of much good. In the forenoon the Mission wagons make the round of the markets, the larger restaurants and hotels, and collect such unused food as can be made available. A large supply of meat is laid in daily, the wholesale butchers furnishing it at cost or even below. Every afternoon at three o'clock a crowd of women, usually little short of two hundred, gathers at the Mission—the young and the old, some in faded shawls and bonnets and others without any head-dress, and among them a sprinkling of wan-faced, sickly children. Some bring pails, jugs, decanters and even baskets, to receive the food. A number eat where would they eat if not at their own club? If they chose to take food home to those who cannot come, they are welcome to do so. We are all fellow human beings, and I cannot sit and see their sufferings unrelieved while I have the power to help it. I have never known a season when there was so much distress in New York as now, and it is growing worse. It is now the sabbath, industrious, intelligent class who are suffering. Behind these crowds who come here daily to be fed at the Eighth Ave. Mission, there is another and far vaster crowd that must inevitably swell their ranks. If we can feed them at two and a half cents a meal, as I have demonstrated, and help them to tide over their troubles temporarily and to avert actual starvation, let us do it, in His name."

The work begun by Mr. Merritt has opened up an appalling vista of human wretchedness and suffering, and has extended far beyond the power of its founder to supply its needs. Believing that a work so signally deserving should not be permitted to suffer for the lack of proper support, Dr. Klopsch, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has undertaken to render such aid as is needed to relieve the most urgent cases of destitution in the homes of Christian families. It is proposed to search out, with the aid of experienced district visitors, such households as belong to "God's poor," but which are now temporarily afflicted. In one such home that was visited, the only carpet—a cheap ingrain—had been torn up and sold to procure food and fuel enough to last a few days, and in another, a desperate mother had sold her woolen undergarment that she might buy bread for her children. There are in New York thousands of devout Christian homes similarly situated, where such help would be welcomed. There is no stronger test of the sincerity of a Christian's love for the Master than his sympathy for the destitute. "Whoso hath this world's good and seeth his brother have need and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" asks the beloved disciple. (1 John 3: 17.) A love that is real will bear the fruits of cheerful obedience, and the giving in such a cause will become not only a pleasure but a means of rich spiritual blessing. We invite the attention of our readers to this relief work, as one that especially calls for their hearty Christian co-operation. Contributions may be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. All gifts will be applied direct to the support of the Mission's Food Fund and duly acknowledged in these columns.

bread that is eaten at this morning breakfast. During the meal, Mr. Merritt addresses the gathering, and when all is over, and the guests are rested and satisfied, they are asked to make room for the next relay, who have meanwhile assembled in front of the Mission and are waiting their turn. At 5:30 a. m. they are admitted and the second serving of food to five hundred men begins, all present first joining in repeating the Lord's Prayer. At 6:30 o'clock the third and last, and frequently the largest crowd is admitted and fed, warmed, encouraged, and comforted. When they depart, the work of the Mission as far as they are concerned, is over for the day.

On reaching the Mission Hall about 3 A. M., early as it is the hour, he finds the sidewalk in front of the building crowded with men anxiously waiting to be admitted. Meanwhile, all is activity in the kitchen (situated in the rear of the hall), where the chef and his volunteer aids are busy preparing for the oncoming crowd. Two great cauldrons are steaming over hot fires, and the grateful aroma of tea and coffee fills the air. Huge piles of loaves, fresh and sweet, are built up on either side of the kitchen in appetizing pyramids. There is a clatter as the mugs are ranged in rows, ready to be filled, each mug holding little short of a quart. At last the doors of the Mission swing wide and the waiting crowd surges in. Some are snow-coated or adrip with rain;

But Mr. Merritt's self-imposed task of loving helpfulness is by no means ended, although his morning guests be gone. For months past, his sympathies have gone out to the suffering women and children, whose wants were for the most part, of a nature that could not be supplied in the early morning charity. In the near neighborhood of fee and bread, but he specially prepares for the "Woman's Club" a great metal pot of "salmagundi" soup, which simmers and boils for hours before the women arrive.

The average daily supply needed for the morning meals and the Woman's Club in the afternoon, is fully 2000 loaves of bread, 400 gallons of tea and coffee and twenty gallons of salmagundi soup. As the latter includes a considerable quantity of good, juicy beef, it is very strengthening and is just what is needed for the women and children. The "Woman's Club" is now widely known on the Westside and will doubtless be adopted as a model for the establishment of similar charities in those parts of the city where the distress is greatest. Thus far, the entire burden of its support has fallen on Mr. Merritt.

"It is not a charity alone, but a club," explained Mr. Merritt, good-humoredly. "They come here, the men in the morning and the women in the afternoon, just as the well-to-do folks go to their big clubs uptown and

SOCIAL MASSACRE.

NO man or woman who was ever created could endure without depletion of vitality the wear and tear of social life in these cities. The demands are at war with the laws that God has established for the welfare of the human race. The hour for assemblage at the modern levee is an outrage. Once at eight o'clock at night, but afterward it was adjourned until 8.30 and then to ten, and there are threats that eleven o'clock at night will be the popular hour. He who goes earlier must pass his time in the hat-room waiting, tilling up the time as he may, while his more interesting counterpart must linger in other quarters in distressing deliberation, and then both descend to the parlors with the fast approaching midnight. Then come the prophecies of nightmare and sick headache and nervous depression in rich viands that bewilder and confound and deplete the stoutest digestive organs. A gentleman writes me for advice, saying: "What shall I do? We have many friends and are invited perpetually. I am on a salary in a large New York business establishment. To meet my engagements I am obliged to rise in the morning at seven o'clock, but I cannot get home from these parties until one in the morning. Then the excitement of the evening keeps me awake for an hour or two after I retire, and the late taking of food disturbs my sleep all night long. I must give up either social life or my business, which is my livelihood? My wife is not willing I should give up social life, for she is very popular, and I have not health to stand it and attend to business. What shall I do?" If I had answered the letter I would have begun by saying:

Dear Sir. If what you say is true your wife is a fool. If she is willing to sacrifice your health and with it the support of the family for the greeting and applause of the midnight saturnalia, I pity you. Use your own judgment, my afflicted correspondent. Once you lose your health and then your business position, and then your income, and see how many levees you will be invited to. All the diamond-laced terrapins at $5 a dozen, which you are invited to partake after your money is gone will not do you any harm. Society will let you drop so suddenly it will knock the breath out of you. Yours truly, Pastor of Brooklyn Talmage.

Recipe for any one who is tired of life and would like to get out of it without the reputation of suicide: Take chicken salad regularly at twelve o'clock at night, and in large quantities, and wash it down with bottles of toddy, and get to your pillow at one o'clock in the morning, and if the third winter does not bring your obituary, it will be because you are proof against that which has slain a host larger than ever fell on any battle-field of the ages. The Scandinavian warriors thought that in the next world they would sit in the Hall of Odin and drink wine from the skulls of their enemies, but modern society, by its demand for late hours and conviviality, would make a man drink out of his own skull, first trying to make it brainless. For the suavities and socialities of life we have great admiration, but it is beyond any human capacity to endure what society imposes upon many.

My deepest sympathies are for those who have official courtesies added. What a social martyrdom they endure—presidents and presidents' wives, senators and senators' wives, governors and governors' wives, mayors and mayors' wives. Many of them pass out of office in confirmed invalidism. They have shaken hands and made and received calls and drank other people's health to the disadvantage of their own, and sacrificed so many hours that ought to have been devoted to restorative slumber that their nerve is gone and their patience is gone and their vivacity is gone and their capacity for work is gone, and soon their life will be gone. For the festivities of life I have only words of commendation, if they be within one's means and controlled by good sense. I believe that God made the fruits and harvests of the earth to eat, and I have no patience with those who would have us go with our mouths muzzled. He put the melting pulp into the peach and the pleasant tartness into the apple, and the saccharine juices into the strawberry, and the nectar into a grape cluster, and the savoriness into beef and venison and canvas-back duck, and taught the nations as they advanced in civilization, to cook, boil, stew, bake, seethe, roast, broil, scramble and fry innumerable viands, and turn out from foundries and factories stoves, ovens, kettles, boilers, chafing dishes, furnaces, frying pans and grid-irons. But it is impossible to tell how many physical, mental and moral woes have come from eating at the wrong time, and eating too much, and eating that which is too luxurious. What is needed in all communities is a few of the princes and princesses of society, with enough courage to break through and break down the ruinous regulations of late hours and Belshazzarean festivity. The people who have suddenly come to fortune and are only the accidents of prosperity will not work the reform needed. But let some of the old families that for generations have been at the top of respectability set themselves against the devastating nonsense of social life. What slaughter by convivialities all down the track of time!

As history moves in a circle, I have wondered if society is not swinging round towards the days of German wassail, or even the worst days of Roman conviviality. The princely saloons in those times had revolving ceilings, representing the firmament and fictitious clouds which rained essences and perfumes on the guests, and their tablets of ivory and tortoise shell and benches of gold, and when a new course of food came into the banquet it was preceded by flutes and hautboys and trumpets. Emperor Tiberius passed two whole days and nights at the festal table. In convivialities Rome shouted and sang and blasphemed and perished. The way American society is moving to-day is the way of death. From what potential drawing-room, from what high place, from what kingly or queenly lips shall come the command to right about face?

HELP ALL YOU CAN.

HELP all you can, among the suffering in these hard times, and help them right away. But "Look out," says some one, "lest you help the unworthy." Indeed, indiscriminate charity is a bad thing, but I notice that those persons who write and talk very much about the dangers of indiscriminate charity never give anything. They may give other people's money to charitable objects but none of their own. They do not give twenty cents in twenty years. The most of this talk about indiscriminate charity is to cover up personal stinginess. Are you very much afraid that the "unworthy" will be helped? Do you not know that the very first demand of our religion is to acknowledge our own unworthiness? If all the unworthy were to be shut out from heaven that would shut us all out. The fear that the stingy Christian expresses about helping the unworthy makes me think of a shipwreck. There they are out in the offing, crew and passengers drowning! On the beach, the lifeboats are got ready, and are about to push out, when some man with great deliberation comes out, and says "Now don't be in a hurry. Let us have this effort for rescuing the drowning carefully organized, or you will save some of those sailors and passengers who are unworthy. Let us first send out a committee in a small boat to examine the wreck, and see which of the unfortunates ought to be brought ashore. Now be careful! Don't let us add to the list of indiscriminate charities!" I say: Fool! stand back! All who will help, get in and pull away for the wreck, and save all you can lift into the lifeboat, and pick up the first fellow you can! Better save fifty unworthy passengers than let one worthy man perish! And applying this principle to the question of relieving destitution, I say better by mistake feed fifty lazy scoundrels, than let one good and worthy man or woman or child, for whom Christ died, freeze or starve.

Subscriber, Harlem, N. Y. I am a clerk in New York, earning moderate wages. I always try to save a little every year to add to my O. A. and E. (Old Age and Emergency) Fund. Now, in considering the prevalent destitution, I am in doubt as to my duty this year. Ought I to add my last year's savings to the O. A. and E. Fund as usual, or ought I to give them to the poor? Christ said "Take no thought for the morrow?" But if I take no thought for the morrow and give away my savings I may become a public charge; if I should lose my position or become unfit for work through sickness or old age? I want to do right. Please tell me what I ought to do?

Thousands of people are in the same position as our correspondent. In view of the prevailing distress among the poor, we should like to hear from as many of our readers as possible, suggesting what they consider the proper course for "Subscriber" to follow.

M. Flack, Trenton, N. J.: What is the seating capacity of the churches throughout the country?

They are said to be capable of seating nearly 43,000,000, and they are presided over by 111,036 pastors of all creeds and denominations. The figures are not ours, but we believe them to be fairly reliable.

Chas. Fidler, Fredericktown, O.: Can anyone be a good, consistent Christian and vote with either of the old parties?

He can, if he votes conscientiously, selecting those candidates who are of upright character and whose general influence would be in the direction of honest government. The only hope of redeeming our impure politics is by conscientious voting, and the exercise of suffrage, in this view, is therefore to be regarded as a duty.

Mr. C. H. Gillam, Oberlin, Kan. We have started a Sabbath School in this out-of-the-way place; but have no means of procuring reading matter. We would like to get a few library books or papers from some Sunday Schools where they have no further use for them. We have an attendance of about fifty, but we are very poor owing to failure in crops.

Possibly some of our readers may be in a position to help this struggling Sunday School by sending them a few books for the library.

J. A. Mahan, Eustis, Fla. What was typified by the oil in the Parable of the wise and foolish virgins Matt 25: 4?

The inward spiritual grace which is necessary to the support of the divine life in the soul. You will see the meaning more clearly in Luke 12: 35, where Christ enjoins his people to keep their light burning. The five foolish virgins represent worldly Christians who are not living spiritual lives, but retain their name and profession and attend the ordinances, yet whose lives are not controlled and guided by the Holy Spirit.

Mr. A. R. H. Drakeville, In. 1. Who was Pythagoras? A lady who claims to be a great student says he was greater than our Saviour. 2. Who was Pythagoras? 3. She believes that Astrology and Alchemy are the great sciences that will reveal and control all our future destiny.

1. A Greek sage and philosopher who lived 600 years B. C., and who is said to have made claims to supernatural origin and miraculous gifts. His doctrine essentially differed from Christianity. He taught that the soul consists of two parts, the rational and the sensuous or irrational, the former only being immortal, and that the released spirits intervened in the affairs of men through dreams and otherwise. Souls that had purged themselves of vice if life entered into bliss, while impure souls were tormented for a time and allowed a new trial by being reincarnated in the forms of men or beasts. He held that the air was full of souls undergoing penance. 2. We never heard of him. 3. These twin sciences, neither of them exact or recognized as sciences by the leading minds of the age, are valueless as explaining spiritual things.

Subscriber, Luftonboro, N. H. What did Paul mean by saying, Rom. 1: 14, that he was a debtor to Greeks and barbarians?

That he had converts from among both. Also that he was under obligation to preach the Gospel to both.

Reader, West Rosedale, Wis. Can you tell me when and by whom, alcohol was first discovered? I have heard that it was discovered in Arabia by one seeking the "Elixir of Life."

Paracelsus, the Teutonic scientist of the sixteenth century, is commonly credited with having discovered alcohol in the course of his experiments to find the "elixir of life." Instead of becoming immortal on earth, according to one account, he died drunk. The real discovery of alcohol, however, probably belongs to a much earlier date.

Reader, Durham, Ont., Can. Do you think a regular attendance at a skating rink hurtful to the character of a young man who professes to be a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ?

The skating rink has been very widely and justly condemned on moral grounds, as a recreation that is apt to become a dissipation. While the mere act of skating is in itself innocent enough, the uniform experience is that vicious associations are readily formed at such places. This is now so generally recognized that it hardly admits of debate. Regular attendance at such places certainly cannot help Christian character, and are very likely to hurt it.

Augusta Baker. — Are Roman Catholic priests justified by the commission to the Apostles (John 20: 23) in giving absolution?

There is a missing link in the chain of argument. Even supposing that they could establish their claim to be successors of the Apostles there is still no evidence that the Apostles had power or authority to endow others with their own privileges. The priests certainly have not inherited the miraculous powers that the Apostles possessed. They can tell you that if you have truly repented of sin and trusted in Christ for salvation, your sins are forgiven, but one does not need to be a priest to tell you that.

A. D. S., Elkhorst, Wis. Can a person be a true Christian and yet be rich? This question came up in our Sunday School a few Sundays ago. It seems to me they would be anxious and count it a great privilege to give, thinking not of themselves, but only that Christ wants them to help, and trusting him for the future.

Yes, riches and Christianity are not inconsistent. The possession of wealth is a stewardship to be accounted for. The mere accumulation of riches for their own sake is a sinful degradation of this stewardship. In the hands of a Christian, wealth is a blessing, as he uses it in accordance with the Divine will in diffusing happiness and helpfulness around him.

Constant Reader, Westminster, Md. 1. What authority have we for saying that the rich man spoken of in the parable in connection with Lazarus was named Dives? 2. Why are so many words in the Bible which apparently need no especial emphasis printed in italics?

1. There is no authority for it. Dives is simply a Latin word signifying rich, and in speaking of Lazarus and Dives, we mean Lazarus and the rich man. It may not have been an actual incident having to do with real persons, but an illustration with typical characters. 2. The italics are not for emphasis; they show that the word is not in the original, but has been inserted by the English translators to render the Hebrew or Greek idiom intelligible to the English reader.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE RIOTS IN SICILY.

SICILY has been called the mother of revolutions. Whether she will give another proof of her right to the title remains to be seen, but the riots which have been going on in the island since the beginning of the year are serious enough to threaten it. They are based on real grievances and are fomented, supported, and encouraged by the enemies of the dynasty. The island is one of the largest in the Mediterranean, about the size of the State of Maryland, and is separated from Italy by the Straits of Messina. Its population is about three and a half millions. A picture of Palermo, its chief town, appears on this page. The present troubles originated in resistance to taxation. Italy's obligations, as a member of the Triple Alliance, require her to maintain an army and navy out of all proportion to the size and wealth of the kingdom, and the burden of supporting them has pressed heavily on the people. To raise the amount required, taxes more or less odious have been imposed. In Sicily one tax known as the "Octroi duties" has especially provoked opposition. It consists of a customs duty levied on every article which enters a town or city. Thus the proprietor of a farm in the country, if he happens to live in a town, is required to pay a tax on the fruit sent for his table from his own farm. This, in addition to the land tax on the farm, which is a heavy one. The poor of the towns complain that the Octroi tax is not only unjust in itself, but is unjustly levied, the collectors and assessors discriminating in favor of the rich. They have risen in rebellion against the tax in several towns, and it has required a strong military force to restore order. In one town the rioters seized the tax-collector tried him before a mock-tribunal on the charge of oppression, convicted him and sentenced him to be shot. The sentence was executed before the government forces could arrive to protect him. In other towns the public buildings have been burned and stores pillaged. The rioters in Marineo marched through the streets nine thousand strong, and when ordered to disperse, attacked the military with rifles and revolvers. The Italian Government has placed the whole island under martial law, and is sending a strong force to suppress the disturbances. European statesmen are watching the progress of the outbreak with some uneasiness. They are aware that other people beside the Sicilians are groaning under the burden of supporting a vast army, and they, too, may rise in revolt. If the outcome of such a movement were a general disarmament, it would be a movement to be hailed with joy; but there is no ground for such hope. The era of universal peace and brotherhood among the nations cannot come that way. It can only come by the advent of Him whose right it is to reign. When that takes place men will beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks and learn war no more. (Isa. 2: 4.)

Digging for a Title.

An interesting excavation is going on in a plot of land in St. Louis, Mo. It is being done in compliance with a suggestion made by a man who died recently. He came to this country from Russia sixteen years ago and settled at St. Louis. He was very poor, but was well educated and of marked refinement of language and deportment. He said that he had been obliged to fly from his country for a political offence. He was extremely reticent, and appeared to be in mortal dread of being traced and carried back to Russia. As years passed and he obtained employment, his acute dread subsided, but he could never be induced to speak of his Russian life. He married and settled down contentedly to American life, but not even to his wife would he communicate his real name, or the nature of the political offence which had brought him under the displeasure of the Czar. When he was stricken with his fatal illness and was assured that it was impossible he could live, he broke his silence. He belonged, he said, to a family high in the Russian nobility, and the proofs of his title to his name and estates were in an iron box which he had buried near the place where he worked. He died before he could indicate the exact spot, and the whole plot is being dug over to find the missing proof. A letter received from Russia by the widow since his death corroborates her dead husband's assertion, but, for obvious reasons, gives no clue to his title or that of the writer. Doubtless the search will be a very thorough one, but it may prove valueless if the dead man's he has forfeited a year of liberty for the sake of five free days. What his enjoyment of those few days was, we are not told, but it surely could not have been enough to compensate him for a year in prison. Everyone perceives the folly of the man, even those who are sacrificing eternity for a few years of worldly pleasure. (Mark 8: 36.)

Trying to Prove Himself Alive.

A young man in business at Terre Haute, Ind., is meeting unexpected difficulties in proving his identity. He is a German tailor, who came to this country as a boy, twenty-two years ago. He obtained work in New York and for some time did well, made friends and corresponded regularly with his parents in Germany. But things changed with him, he fell into bad ways, his friends drifted away from him and he ceased to write home. He left the city and went to Massachusetts, and after a period of wandering, began life anew at Terre Haute, Ind. Shortly after he left New York, a young tailor bearing the same name, committed suicide. The friends of the absent man, concluding that the suicide was their old acquaintance, gave him a decent burial and notified his family in Germany of their bereavement. After settling at Terre Haute, the young man wrote to his family, but they supposed that some impostor was trying to fasten himself upon them and did not answer his letter. Recently he availed himself of an opportunity to come to New York and looked up his old friends, but they refused to receive him. He had changed considerably in appearance and as they declared they had attended his funeral, they ridiculed his claim. From them he learned how it was that his letters were not answered. He her as she moved around the room. When she spoke, the man's curiosity vanished and a look of shame and humiliation came into his face. He rose to quit the room although his hunger was still unsatisfied, but Mrs. Graham stopped him and asked him if he would not stay for something to eat. Bursting into tears the man clasped her hand and asked her if she did not know him. "I am your brother, John," he said. Mrs. Graham looked at him and recognized him as her only brother who left his home in Scotland many years ago and had not been heard of since. Her joy in the reunion was as great as his own for he is the only member of the family left to her. Although such a reunion is rare there are many who in feeding and helping the poor have found a brother in the Lord of whose existence they would otherwise have been ignorant. (Heb. 13: 2.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Boards of Relief in Chicago are working together to raise a million dollars to supply the demands for food and clothing of the destitute in that city.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond, the children's evangelist, has been holding a series of sermons in the People's Central Church of St. Louis, Mo.

It is stated by a New York journal learned in statistics that there is church seating capacity in the United States for 43,000,000 people. There are 111,036 ministers; this would give to each minister a congregation of 387.

A lady in New York who will not allow her name to be stated has given $71,000 to the Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society to be used for the erection of a building for the benefit of the children on the east side. It is to be called God's Providence Mission and will have accommodations for an industrial school, kindergarten, day nursery and lecture room.

The services conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey at Providence, R. I., were crowded from the beginning. At the first meeting the large Music Hall was thronged as soon as the doors were opened, and the Central Baptist Church was filled with the overflow. Mr. Moody's address was marked by all his old time power, and Mr. Sankey's singing thrilled every hearer as in former days. Major Whittle and Mr. Bliss took charge of the overflow meeting in the Central Church.

The journal of the recent Protestant Episcopal Convention shows a wonderful increase in that church during the past twenty years. The number of communicants has increased from 26,282 in 1873 to 57,639 last year. In 1873 the confirmations were 2,385; last year they numbered 4,373. In the same period the Sunday School progress has been from 2,081 teachers to 4,164, and from 22,473 scholars to 44,465.

The secretaries of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions wish all the churches to understand that the letters of endorsement they have given to the Nestorian lecturer Rabbi Baha were given under a misapprehension and that they are not to be regarded as now valid.

A prayer-meeting for policemen is held at the rooms of the Christian Police Association 235 West Thirtieth St., New York, every Wednesday afternoon at three o'clock. One of the most regular attendants is a retired policeman who is now blind. Mr. J. L. Spicer, of the American Sunday School Union, is the Secretary of the Association.

The Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions will hold its second annual convention at Detroit, Mich., February 28-March 4. Thirty Missionary Societies have promised to send delegates. It is expected that representatives will be present from upwards of two hundred Colleges, Theological Seminaries, and Medical Schools in this country and Canada.

Benevolent societies in New York are complaining that their work is made heavier by the retrenchment of wealthy families. Several applications for help have come to one society recently from coachmen, hostlers, etc., who have been discharged after years of faithful service, the only reason being that their employers are becoming more economical. It is earnestly hoped that in this time of distress Christian employers will not, unless absolutely compelled, add to the number of unemployed by discharging their servants. Where retrenchment is necessary, the societies hope that it will be made in some other way than the one that involves suffering for others.

PALERMO, THE CAPITAL OF SICILY, THE SCENE OF THE RECENT RIOTS.

offence was of a nature to involve the confiscation of his estates. Whether it is successful or not, the widow would do well to make a search of another kind. If she will search the word of God she will learn that it is possible for her to attain a title of more value than any of earthly nobility, as the daughter of the Lord Almighty. (John 1: 12.)

The Cost of a Brief Liberty.

A man who was sent to Sing Sing prison last week, for a year, is deploring the impatience which brought him there. This is not the first time he has been confined in that prison. Some time ago he was convicted of stealing a gold watch and chain from a sleeping-car on the New York Central Railroad and was sentenced to a term of imprisonment in Sing Sing. By good conduct he had earned a reduction of one year in his term and last June his sentence came within five days of its expiration. As is customary with prisoners about to be released, he was employed outside the prison walls. An opportunity to escape presented itself and although the man knew that in five days he would be liberated, he could not resist the temptation to run away. He succeeded in getting away and since that time has evaded the officers who were searching for him. A few days ago, however, a policeman who knew him saw him in the street and arrested him. He was sent back to Sing Sing to serve out the five days remaining of his term and such time as had been allowed to him for good behavior. As this a full year, related a number of incidents of their past acquaintance and at last succeeded in convincing one of them that he was the man he professed to be. Through that friend communication was re-opened with his family in Germany and he has received a letter from them inviting him to prove his identity by writing a history of his boyhood and mentioning facts not known to anyone outside the family. It may be hoped, for his sake, that he will succeed in convincing them, as considerable property is involved. It is the converse of this task that awaits one who would be an heir of God and a joint heir with Christ. He has not to prove that he is alive, but that he is dead to the world and his life is hid with Christ in God. (Col. 3: 3.)

A Surprise in a Mission.

There are many people in Newark, N. J., in need of food, as there are in other cities in this time of business depression. Kindly Christian ladies are helping them and, among others, Mrs. Annie Graham who is conducting evangelistic meetings at the Bethel Church, is engaged in the philanthropic work. She gave a dinner in the church on January 6, and her guests belonged to the class which the Saviour said that his followers should invite—"the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind. Among those who accepted the invitation was a hungry man who, although physically sound, was out of work. He looked curiously at his hostess as he entered and his eyes followed

THE DIVINE PETITIONER.

Text: John 17: 24, "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me; for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world."

THE chapter from which this text is taken is one of the most beautiful and sacred portions of Holy Scripture. It is the holy of holies in the glorious Temple of Revelation. It consists of our Lord's intercessory prayer, the true Lord's prayer. In this prayer the divine Redeemer anticipates his great sacrifice for human guilt, and on the ground of that sacrifice he offers this prayer for his people. His thoughts are now to a great degree withdrawn from the world; already he seems to have entered in the closest communion with the Father; he speaks, indeed, as if his earthly work of suffering and sacrifice was already completed. This prayer followed immediately on the close of the discourse given in the previous chapter. Dr. Owen and others express the opinion that this prayer could scarcely have been offered on the way from the city to the Garden of Gethsemane. One feels in reading these calm and sublime utterances that they must have been spoken in some secluded place. It certainly seems unlikely that they could have been spoken on a great thoroughfare, which even at midnight, during Passover week, would be filled with the strangers then in and about Jerusalem. It is most natural to suppose that it was uttered before Christ and the disciples left the supper-room. At the end of the fourteenth chapter we have read the words: "Arise, let us go hence;" but it seems more probable that although they arose to go, they still lingered around the table, unwilling to break off a discourse so sweet and heavenly. We can readily understand that all that is recorded in the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth chapters was spoken in the guest-chamber while the disciples stood about the Master. It is difficult to imagine that our Lord would have uttered these solemn, confidential and sublime words on the street. He could not have spoken to eleven men, making a hasty departure from the city, without speaking in a comparative loud tone; and such a tone would have been inconsistent with the thoughts expressed, and would also have exposed him and his disciples to dangers from their foes. When both the discourse and the prayer were ended we can well believe that then they chanted the appropriate psalm and went forth into the garden in solemn silence.

The Voice of Power.

This is rightly called an intercessory prayer, and yet the term in this connection must have a special meaning. This is not the prayer of an inferior to a superior; it is rather the expression of the will of one who is conscious of equality with him to whom the expression is made. It gives us an illustration of the prayer of our great High Priest now before the throne. All commentators, ancient and modern, have spoken of the tact that the words of this prayer flow on in equal simplicity and sublimity. The words themselves are so plain that the simplest mind may understand them; and yet they are so deep that no finite mind can fathom all their meaning. Bengel says: "This chapter is the most easy in respect to its language and the most profound in respect to its sentiments." When John Knox came to die, he asked for the reading of this precious chapter. We are told that the devout Spenser had it read to him three times when he was on his death-bed. Luther, Tholuck, Olshausen, Stier, Melancthon and others speak of the profound impression which this high-priestly prayer made upon their minds and hearts.

The prayer has been variously divided. We may say that it consists of three main parts. In the first five verses we have the prayer for the glorification of the Son; in verses six to nineteen, intercession for his own, whom he leaves in the world, and beginning with the twentieth verse and going to the end of the chapter we have a petition with largest range of meaning for the whole Church of God in all times. We may express the thought more briefly by saying that in the first division we have Christ's prayer for himself primarily; and in the second for the apostles specifically, and in the third for believers generally. In studying the text it seemed fitting to say this much about the relation of the chapter to the discourse which preceded it, and on the prayer as a whole.

Let us notice, in the first place,

The Petitioner.

Here our Lord appears with kingly authority blending with priestly intercession. The words "I will," do not so much express increased earnestness as they suggest the Petitioner's essential and conscious equality with the Father. Who is this sublime Petitioner? Is he a man? Did man ever so address God? Did man ever venture to use language of such authority in his approaches to the Deity? This prayer is founded on the conscious right of the Petitioner to present this claim. He recognizes his relationship to the Eternal, his equality with Deity.

It is not so much a petition asking for a favor as it is a declaration of a purpose. He expresses as a king, the purpose that those who are his should share with him in his glory. No Old Testament saint ever so addressed God; Abraham did not so presume in the divine presence; in that presence he spoke of himself as dust and ashes. David did not so presume. Here is a voice conscious of authority not possessed by patriarch or prophet, not by psalmist or apostle. This utterance illustrates the majesty of a sovereign rather than the humility of a subject. These are truly wonderful words. Dare angel or archangel so pray? They prostrate themselves before God and cry, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts." This petition clearly implies that Christ is equal with God, that he is God. At the same time the prayer reveals his true humanity. Here the divine and human graciously and wonderfully blend; but no skill of man can separate them so as to describe what belongs to the human and what to the divine. This Petitioner is the divine Lord, holding sublime and ineffable communion with his Father. We cannot but feel that here we are standing on holy ground; that here we are in the inner sanctuary, the holy of holies, of gospel history and of divine revelation. We rightly say that the will of the Son and the will of the Father are one; that there is no collision, no contradiction, no contrast. The prayer of the Son, therefore, is the echo of the desire of the Father; the Son's matchless words voiced the Father's eternal love and purpose. Christ is the Word. In him the Father's thought of love finds voice. If we know the Son we know the Father.

In studying this prayer we have, in the next place,

Its Subjects.

"they also whom thou hast given me." The objects of the Father's love were given to Christ, and are now the subjects of his petition. The reference is not to the apostles alone, but to believers in all times and places. Believers in Christ are given to him as the Father's most precious gift; and their love to Christ as his resplendent jewel. There is unspeakable sweetness to every Christian heart in this divine relationship. All who are to be saved are given to Christ in the eternal purpose of God. No one but God knows who these are, but it is certain that there will be a vast number. The glowing prophecy of Isaiah teaches us that the Lord shall see the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied. The description of heaven given in the book of Revelation shows that the number of the redeemed will be unspeakably great. It will also be of all nations, kindreds, tongues and people. Perhaps the number of the lost will be to the saved in some such proportion as the number now confined in prisons is to those at liberty in all the walks of life.

No question can be more important than this one, "Have we been given to Christ?" Are we clothed in his righteousness, washed in his blood, transformed into his likeness? How can any man know that he has thus been given to Christ? We cannot look into God's secret book; no angel can descend from heaven to make to us announcement regarding this matter. But still a man may know whether or not he is elected to be saved. The answer to

is not to be found by our inquisitive looking into God's secret counsels; it is not to be found in the indulgence of wicked presumption; it is not to be found in the culpable indifference which says, If I am to be saved, I shall be saved; if not, I cannot be. If a man will stop there, he certainly never will be saved. How then can we know that we have been given to Christ? The answer is simple and practical; every essential religious duty is simple and practical. As many are given to Christ by God as have given themselves to God through Christ; as many are elected to be saved as have elected Christ as their Saviour. A man knows that he is elected of God when God is elected by him. We may learn the answer to this great question just as we learn whether or not we are Christians. Your answers to the questions which I now ask will be answers to the questions which I have just asked: "Have you believed on Jesus Christ? Have you accepted him as your only Saviour? Have you committed your soul to his keeping? Can you say now that you trust him and him alone as your Saviour in life, in death, and in eternity? Do you answer humbly but earnestly in the affirmative? Then you are of the number spoken of in this prayer. The question with us is not one of election on God's part so much as it is one of candidacy on our part, for no man is ever elected except he be a candidate. Are you with all your soul a candidate? Then, as God liveth, you are elected to eternal salvation. If we have committed our souls to Christ it is as certain that God has committed us to him as if an angel from heaven should announce that fact by an audible voice at this moment. The commitment of our souls to Christ is just the earthly side of God's eternal commitment of our souls to Christ. If you choose God in Christ you have the best and only evidence possible that God has chosen you in Christ. If you are excluded from those for whom Christ prayed, it is because you exclude yourself. If you are not now with Christ in love and faith, you cannot be with Christ at his glory. Oh, give yourself to-day to the Lord Jesus, and you shall have the blessed evidence that you have been given to him by God as his most precious gift. Commit yourself to his keeping now, and you shall know that he will keep you as his choicest treasure until that day when he shall make up his jewels.

Notice, in the third place,

The Petition

itself—that they may "be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me." The first thought in this prayer is that Christ's own may be with him. These are wonderful words. They are high; we cannot attain to them. They are deep; we cannot fathom them. There is here an outpouring of Christ's eternal love. The thought cannot be fully comprehended, far less expressed. This great honor is the result of eternal love. It would be false humility which would lead us to refuse what that love bestows. True humility is seen in doing, being, and having what God's grace gives. This prayer of Christ is very precious; he would have us where he is. Christ's presence is heaven. Anywhere with Jesus is heaven; nowhere without him can his disciples have heaven. Here our Lord conceives of himself as already having finished his life, completed his sacrifice and returned to his Father. He, therefore, presents this claim for the eternal companionship of his disciples. They, like him, are to pass from earthly toil to heavenly glory. His thoughts sweep across the cross and the tomb to the crown and the throne. This part of the petition is in harmony with the sentiment expressed in the 2d and 3d verses of the 14th chapter, where he speaks of his Father's house and the place he was going to prepare.

We behold here the matchless mystery of eternal and ineffable love. Christ longs for our presence; our companionship is sweet to him. This is a marvelous condescension on his part; this is indescribable exaltation for us. Such condescending love is like Christ. We are to be with him, and that not at his feet, but on his throne. As he overcame and is enthroned, so we are to overcome and be enthroned by his side. Further he could not go. Additional exaltation is impossible.

We learn also that we are to behold his glory. While he was upon earth that glory was obscured; to become man he veiled its splendor. Its brightness would dazzle and blind our human eyes. During his earthly life the hidden glory once burst through the veil of flesh, and the disciples were overwhelmed with its splendor. Now we have eyes to see only through a glass darkly; now we have minds able to know only in part; but the life to come shall give us the beatific vision of our Lord. We shall then see the king in his beauty. Many passages of Scripture fully corroborate these statements. The word here translated "behold" implies the open sight of his glory; and it suggests our transformation into his perfect image. He so loved his people that he came to die for them; he so loves them still that he desires them.

To Reign with Him Forever.

He is the head; they are the members of his body. Only when they are together will the glory of both be complete. The exalted occupation of the redeemed will be in beholding the glory of the Redeemer. Probably the glory here meant is that for which he prayed when he said, "Glorify thou me, with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." Earlier in his prayer we see his longing to have his saints at his side. We are to be like Christ, because we shall see him as he is; and it is also true that we shall see him as he is because we shall be like him. These two truths cannot be separated. This glory would then include the whole sweep of his eternal perfections and character. Moses prayed, "Show me thy glory," and God made his goodness pass before him. There is material in this part of my text for a volume. We may say with Dr. Cumming, that we shall behold his creative glory, his providential glory, and, most of all, his redemptive glory. This latter is the grandest thought of heaven. To see this glory the angels had strong desire. We already know something of its mystery and majesty; already some drops of the divine love have come into our hearts; but in heaven we shall bathe in an ocean of love. Then we shall know the preciousness of that blood which hath cleansed us; then we shall know the excellence of that righteousness whose robe we wear; then we shall now something of the breadth, height, and depth of that love which passeth all knowledge. Blessed knowledge! Glorious day! Beatific vision! May the prayer of Christ be answered in the experience of us all.

We notice, in the last place, the ground or

for this petition "for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world." This, at first sight, seems to be strange language. I confess that in studying this passage I did not at once see its relation to the previous parts of the text; but when I did, its meaning was to me unspeakably glorious. We see here that the Father's love is the reason for giving the Son such wonderful glory as that already described. Had the words been, "for thou lovedst them before the foundation of the world," the meaning would seem more apparent. That is also true, for God did so love men. But to understand this great thought we must go deeper into the mystery and beauty of Christ's rhetoric. The ground of our hope is not merely God's love to us, but God's love to Christ. The glory promised is not due to any arbitrary allotment or capricious arrangement. Christ and his people are one, he is in them and they in him; but we advance a step; not only are we Christ's but Christ is God's. God sees his people in his only begotten and well-beloved Son. God's love to Christ antedates the creation of all human beings. It was a love which existed from eternity between the persons of the blessed Godhead. When we are in Christ by faith we share in the Father's love for the divine Son. When Christ's work is completed, he will present us as a glorious people without spot or wrinkle or any such thing. Luther said of this text, we should make this sentence our pillow and a bed of down for our souls, and with a glad heart repair to it when the happy our draws nigh." My highest wish for you, my dear readers, and for myself, is expressed by the apostle Paul when he said of himself, "And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith," you have given your hearts unto Christ when God has given you unto Christ; then you are prayed for in this text: then you shall be with him where he is: then you shall behold his glory, and then you may go on developing in knowledge and character, gazing upon this beatific vision, and so finish this sermon in heaven.

LOOKING TO JESUS.

FROM a missionary in India comes the following beautiful and helpful incident of Christian work in Bombay, India: A young and lovely girl lay dying, surrounded with all the love and care of attached parents. Her religion had hitherto consisted in a round of ritualistic observances, and it had nothing in it to meet her need. The clergyman was sent for, and when he came the family were assembled. He produced a missal. He intoned the service for the sick. Having received Alice's confession and pronounced absolution, administered the sacrament, and placing his hands on her, blessed her, he pronounced her a good child of the church. But his poor girl was not satisfied. "Father," she said, "I am going to die. Where am I going?" He gave no reply. "Mother can't you tell me what I am to do to get to heaven?" No reply, save tears. "William, you were to be the guide of my life; can you tell me anything of the future?" No response even from her intended husband.

Alice was attended by a little girl who kindly addressed the invalid. "There is a teacher in the village who proclaims salvation through Jesus Christ, and urges us to accept forgiveness offered in the Gospel." "Oh, that I could see him!" exclaimed the dying girl.

He was accordingly sent for. When this man of God entered the room, Alice appealed to him—"Can you tell me what I must do to obtain rest for my soul?"

"I fear I cannot," "Alas! is there no hope for me?" "Stay," said he; "though I cannot tell you what you can do to be saved, I can tell you what has been done for you. Jesus has completely finished the work by which lost sinners may be righteously saved. He was 'made sin for us,' He 'bare our sins in his body on the tree,' Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

"And have I nothing to do?" "Nothing—but to believe. No doing, working, praying, can give relief to the conscience burdened with a sense of guilt, or rest to the troubled heart. It is not a work done in you by yourself, but a work done for you by Another, long, long ago. Jesus has completed the work of our redemption. He has said, 'It is finished.' Through faith in him you have pardon. 'God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son.' Believe the message which God sends you. Cast yourself in child-like confidence on the atonement made by the blood-shedding of Christ. Look to 'Jesus only.' Look to him who was pierced on Calvary's Cross for your sins. 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.'"

The awakened sinner listened with breathless attention. The Holy Spirit, through the Word of God revealed Christ to her soul. The glad tidings of salvation fell as balm upon her wounded spirit. The burden of her sin had rolled away forever.

THE CHRISTIAN'S SECURITY.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

EXULTINGLY the Christian sings,
Who sought and found beneath Al-mighty wings,

A covert from life's storms that wildly beat;
To be forever in this safe retreat
An object of divine solicitude,
What soul could ever wish for higher good!

Tho' hell should dare to aim its venom'd dart

He fears no ill, for God's own sacred heart
That covers him, 'twill pierce before a harm
Can come to those within his circling arm.
Locked in that strong embrace he well can boast

His triumphs o'er hell's dark relentless host.

O weary soul, cease here thy wanderings
Beneath the shadow of protecting wings;
The burning noonday's sun shall no more smite

Upon thy head, nor yet the moon by night.
With such a canopy of love o'erhead
A child of God need fear no coming dread.

To him that bides beneath Almighty wings,
The very thought of death no terror brings;
As tired babes by mother hand undressed,
Pillow their heads on the maternal breast,
E'en so our God disrobes his saints for sleep.
And o'er their beds bids angels vigils keep.

And is this death? Oh strange transition Bright—

From this unfriendly world to realms of light,
This letting down the bars life's dusky e'vn
And stepping into sunny fields of Heav'n.
Sweetest similitude, 'tis entering
The Palace-gate to view the beauteous King.

AWAKE! HE COMETH!

Written for "The Christian Herald."

WAKE! weary Bride from slumber;
Be watching unto prayer;
With oil thy vessel well supply,
And trim thy lamp with care.
The Bridegroom will not tarry,
Nor lengthen his delay:
The herald trumpet soon will peal,
And summon thee away!

The banquet hall is ready,
With dazzling light aglare;
The table groaning with the weight
Of rich and dainty fare.
The guests are all invited:
The door stands open wide;
The Marriage Supper of the Lamb Awaits his honored Bride.

Oh! what a joyous ending,
To years of waiting here!
What glorious sunshine after storm:
What peaceful resting near.
Look up! Look up, he cometh!
What comfort in his word,
"I quickly come, and thou shalt be Forever with thy Lord."

THE BEMA.

The Judgment of Christians as to Degrees of Merit Before the Millennium.

BY DR. MAC KILLIAM.*

OUR subject is the Judgment Seat of Christ, or the Bema. That is a very different thing from the Judgment of the Great White Throne. One is coming in contact, every now and again with true believers, who confound the one with the other. They are, however, two very distinct things. The judgment of the Great White Throne does not take place until after the Millennium, and the Judgment Seat of Christ takes place before the Millennium. The Great White Throne Judgment is only for those who are spoken of as the "wicked dead;" but at the Judgment Seat of Christ only the saints will appear. (II. Cor. 5: 9, 10.) "Wherefore we labor," i. e., we endeavor—this is our great aim and object—"That whether present or absent"—i. e., whether the Lord is present or absent—"we may be accepted of him." The ambition of all who are filled with the power of the Spirit of God, after being saved, is to be accepted of him—or, rather, to be well-pleasing unto Jesus. Unless the Spirit of the Lord has given us, as his children, this great ambition, we can be looking forward with nothing but discomfort to the Judgment-seat of Christ. Have we aspired to this? Is this our great ambition? Then we are looking forward to the Judgment-seat of Christ with earnest longing that, present or absent, we shall be well-pleasing unto him.

Before we enter fully into a description of the Judgment-seat of Christ, or the Bema, let us consider fully the nature of this Judgment. Nobody but a true Christian will stand before the Judgment-seat of Christ. There will be no question raised as to our sins; that question has been raised and settled before this. No one can enter those lists until they have received life. Judgment as to our natural condition is past before we can look forward to the Judgment Seat of Christ: the question as to our natural condition as sinners has been settled previous to our appearance before the Bema. There is the judgment of the Cross; and in the case of every true believer, our judgment, the death for sin, the doom pronounced upon us as to our natural condition—the sentence, has been executed; we have been put to death in the person of the substitute on the Cross of Calvary. It is a grand thing to know that: to have our hearts free from all fear about that. When this question is settled and we know it, then begins our life which leads upward to the Bema.

Most of us, believe that the Rapture of the Saints, the being taken from this present evil world to meet our Lord in the air, is part of the great purpose of God and that Christ will then reward each believer according to his work. We do not differ on that point. The question of the Bema is a question of loss or reward: we shall all be saved, but we shall not all receive the same reward. The definition, the Judgment-seat of Christ, signifies the time when the Lord's own saints will be tested as to their works as the servants of the Lord Jesus Christ. And this is an individual thing. I believe that it takes place very soon after the Rapture. It is a question of our works whether he can call them good or bad. As a friend said to me recently speaking on this point, "I am going out to Chicago as a Judge—I am not, however, going to Judge men as malefactors; but I am going to see their works. Some will be excellent and they will be awarded prizes; others will be very good, these will receive certificates; and yet others will be inferior, we shall not be able to give these prizes, we cannot even give them certificates of merit."

At this Judgment-seat of Christ, the whole life, since we became true Christians; all our thoughts and words and actions; all our works whether profitable or unprofitable—shall pass before the eye of our Lord, and the Lord will pronounce whether these works have been in his estimation good or bad. Many of us, perhaps, have been in a ferment of Christian works, and yet the Lord will have to pronounce the work very inferior, because there was so much with us of the flesh; and, so many who are first now shall be last then, and many who now consider themselves very poor, weak things, shall hear the "Well done, good and faithful servant."

BLESSED TO BLESS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 4, Gen. 12: 2; Matt. 10: 7, 8.

WHY did not Christ keep his disciples near him during the few years he had at his disposal? He was intrusting them with a commission which would task their powers to the utmost; why, then, did he not have them with him as much as possible, to teach them and thoroughly ground them in the doctrines of the Gospel, which they were to give to the world? A great teacher introducing to the world some new religion in this day would adopt that method. But Christ chose the course which was in harmony with his conception of his kingdom. Having called his twelve disciples, he sent them forth to heal the sick and to cleanse the lepers and as they went, they were to preach the one message, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand." Their work and their message were in unison. Imagine one of these disciples approaching some poor creature tortured with an incurable disease, such as leprosy. Life to such a sufferer must be a continuous misery. As he saw men whom he knew, gaining wealth and honor, marrying and having family and friends, winning respect and enjoying social pleasures, how must he have mourned over the loathsome malady which shut him out from society and barred his way to all that was pleasant and enjoyable in life! To him existence must be a type of what the preachers describe hell to be. But he meets one of these messengers of Christ and is healed. Now, he can enter society; he is no longer an outcast; the avenues to the prizes of life are open to him. He can understand and realize now the message which the man who has healed him proclaims. For him the kingdom of heaven is indeed at hand. And the messenger, how does he feel? Is he not happier for what he has done? Does he not love and honor and reverence the Being who has given him the power to transform the sufferer's life? Now he perceives why he was sent forth. The thing he has done, by the power given to him, opens his eyes to the principles of Christ's kingdom, as they could never have been opened by teaching. His heart is opened. He loves the man whom he has been the means of blessing. No man can render a real service to another without loving him more after he has rendered it than he did before. It is a law of our nature and it never fails. The messenger returns to his Master full of joy, longing for more power and knowledge. His commission is then enlarged, but only by a little. It becomes threefold. He is to continue his work of healing, relieving and helping, having especial regard to the poor and the outcast who need it most; he is to enlist new recruits into the service, and he is to forgive any who have personally injured him. Those three injunctions are sufficient for the time. He is to love all and to use every opportunity of helping others to the full extent of his power. We have passed beyond these elementary duties now and have largely laid them aside and are concerning ourselves about doctrines and mysteries. We are arguing and dogmatizing as to the nature of the Trinity, as to election and foreordination, as to the final perseverance of the saints and the eternal punishment of the wicked, as to the mode of baptism and the robes that preachers should wear, and innumerable other questions of like importance. Well, we pride ourselves on our wisdom and on the advance we have made in nineteen centuries, but we can imagine Christ looking down from his throne in his church and wishing that his people troubled themselves less about these things and were more anxious to fulfill the three elementary injunctions he gave to his first disciples. The Church would have made more progress in holiness and power and in the evangelization of the world had it presented to the world a spectacle of a band of men loving Christ, loving each other and eager to help their fellow-men.

YALE UNIVERSITY Y. M. C. A.

Dwight Hall, a picture of which appears on this page, is the home of the Young Men's Christian Association of Yale University. It is very gratifying to know that in these days of prevalent unbelief among the higher classes, fully one-half of the students in this great University are members of the Young Men's Christian Association. It is to the Universities of to-day that we look for the men who in a few years will be leaders in the state, the church and society. It is therefore an augury of good that the young men of this University in so large a proportion have affiliated themselves with a distinctively religious institution. The work of the College Association is necessarily different from that of a city or country association. Its members are within its sphere of influence for only a definite limited period and its constituency is therefore constantly changing. The opportunity for usefulness is consequently short and must be improved promptly and with concentrated effort if it is to be improved at all. It may be inferred from the programme of the Association for this year that its leaders are alive to the responsibility in this particular. Its chief feature is three Bible Classes. The Senior class conducted by Dr. W. L. Phelps is studying the life of the Apostle Paul; the Sophomore class under the leadership of Mr. C. B. Coleman is studying the Parables of Christ; and the Juniors led by Mr. A. P. Stokes, Jr., studying the Life of Christ. In addition to these classes there are devotional meetings, meetings for the training of workers, and lectures by the Professors in turn on Biblical subjects. All these meetings are well attended. It is seldom that those present number less than two hundred.

THE KING'S DAUGHTERS' CLUB.

A delightful story of a helpful work initiated and developed by a band of King's Daughters in Chicago, is sent to the "Silver Cross." It appears that three years ago a circle of King's Daughters, looking around for some mode of helpfulness, formed a club for the benefit of the wage-earning girls in the city. As a preliminary step, they gave a concert, which proved more successful than was expected. With the funds thus obtained, a cottage in a suitable neighborhood was hired and the club was formed. The membership at the end of a week was about forty, and it has since increased to two hundred. The small dues and a little outside assistance supplied educational appliances and a corps of teachers was engaged. One of these was paid a salary and seventeen volunteered their services gratuitously. As the club grew in numbers and usefulness the need of a better building was felt, and an effort was made to raise funds for the purpose. In a short time the building fund amounted to $1,438, and with this sum a plot of land was purchased. A gentleman who sympathized with the work built a suitable edifice on the ground and placed it at the disposal of the club at a low rental with the option to purchase at cost price whenever the club was able to pay for it. Already the club has nearly half the amount required in its treasury and expects soon to have the whole. Besides affording a cheerful meeting-place for the girls, there are classes in millinery, dressmaking, shorthand, typewriting, and other useful branches of work, as well as lectures and literary studies. The girls of the city heartily appreciate the institution and derive practical benefit from it.

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

A vigorous manifesto against Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor is published by Rev. Julius E. Wright in the "Christian Advocate" of Nashville, Tenn. He expresses grave fears that the Interdenominationalism which such societies would engenin Bible readers' work was awarded to the Union at Brookings, S. D. There was some surprise that the coveted distinction should have gone to that town instead of to some city boasting of greater culture. The explanation, however, is a very simple one. Miss Abbie Ross, the Secretary of the Brookings Union, is a lady of singular ability as a teacher and is endowed with the rare faculty of inspiring others with her own enthusiasm. It was largely due to her energy, industry and activity that the studies of the Union were so thorough and successful. Miss Ross, whose portrait appears on this page, is the daughter of a faithful pioneer Baptist minister, and has been a prominent worker in religious circles in South Dakota almost from her childhood.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A monthly devotional meeting of King's Daughters is held in the Broadway Tabernacle, 34th St. and Broadway, New York, the second Friday of the month at 2.30 P.M.

The growth of Christian Endeavor Societies during the last six months has been larger than ever before in the history of the movement.

The Young Men's Christian Associations of New York will hold their State Convention at Jamestown, February 22-25. Delegates will be supplied with tickets of one fare for the round trip.

Recent letters from Australia relate that the Christian Endeavor Society is having a widespread and stimulating influence upon the churches of the colonies, most of the evangelical denominations having adopted the movement.

The Baptist Young People's Union of Brownstown (Ind.) Association, met recently in the Mt. Pleasant Baptist Church and assisted in the formation of a B. Y. P. U. there. Twenty young people gave in their names as a commencement and work has been commenced with enthusiasm.

The Board of Managers of the Baptist Young People's Union of Bloomfield Association, Ill., will hold a mid-winter Convention of Associational Union at Paris, Ill., Feb. 23-24, 1894. All Unions and Young People's Societies of the Association are urged to send delegations. The Paris Union will furnish all delegates and visitors free entertainment.

Young Men's Christian Associations are urged to contribute toward the expense of the Association in the City of Mexico. It is doing an aggressive missionary work among the young men of the city, but is hampered by lack of funds. The Secretary is Mr. I. E. Munger, who was formerly Secretary of the Y.M.C.A. of Muscatine, Iowa. The pressing need is for $1,500.

Mr. W. T. Stead, writing to the "Young Men's Era" in favor of the proposal to unite the work of the Young Men's Christian Association with that of the Young Women's Christian Association, says: "To judge from the way in which some good people talk you would think that if they had been God Almighty they would have had all the boys born in one family and all the girls born in another, but somehow the Creator did not fix it up that way, and I think we ought to respect his judgment."

The Homes of Turkistan.

Social and Domestic Life in a Comparatively Unknown Corner of the World.

HERE are still many parts of the interior of Asia to which only a few Western travellers have penetrated, and whose customs and civilization are of the most primitive patriarchal order.

Chinese Turkistan is a territory of this character. It is in the heart of Central Asia, and is bounded on three sides by vast mountain ranges, the eastern end lying open to the great Gobi desert. The dwellers in a locality so remote from civilization, so completely hemmed in by natural barriers, and isolated from communication with the outer world, might pass many generations in ignorance of the progress of their fellow-beings.

In recent years, this secluded portion of the globe has been visited by Russian and English military expeditions, some coming by way of the desert, others across the icy and almost inaccessible mountains. An interesting account of a recent journey to Yarkand, the principal town of this strange settlement, is given by Rev. Dr. Henry Lansdell in "Black and White." The traveller had taken with him a quantity of printed Scriptures, hoping to be able to distribute these in some of the Turkistan towns and villages, where, he was informed, no printed copy of the Bible had ever been seen. On this mission he visited Kashgar, Yengi, Hissar, Yarkand, Kharghalik, and witnessed many strange and novel sights. The journey was not wholly free from peril, for at least one traveler—Mr. Dalgleish, an Englishman—had been murdered by natives. He was fortunate in securing an insight into the social and domestic life of the people and in taking several photographs, (one of which is reproduced on this page from the original publication). The women were particularly averse to being photographed. He found the men and women of the country, as a whole, utterly depraved. It was not an uncommon thing for a woman of twenty years to have had as many husbands. Marriage has no special binding effect upon the parties and divorces are declared upon the most frivolous pretenses. Woman's position in home life is degrading in the extreme. This is an example of what Mohammedanism has done for a people who have been under its sway for centuries. Schools are rare, and there is not a properly trained physician in the whole country. Thus far, none of the Christian Churches have sent a missionary to these people, whose total number Dr. Lansdell estimates at two millions. In the Middle Ages, Nestorian Christianity had a foothold there, but it was ruthlessly stamped out by the iron heel of the Moslem rulers.

At one town, during his stay in Turkistan, an incident occurred which illustrates the superstitious character of the people. A woman was suspected of having a devil and it was decided to take the necessary steps to cast out the evil spirit. A "mullah," or priest, was sent for, who uttered some prayers in Arabic and a crowd of people gathered around the victim, some with tambourines. A rope was fastened to a stout beam above and to a log below and the woman, who was about sixty years old, was placed at the foot of the rope and various articles passed mysteriously over her head and around the rope. She was then made to stand over a lighted brazier, and was almost enveloped in its smoke. Five men then walked around her, while the crowd banged drums and made a deafening noise with other musical instruments. The woman was next compelled to walk around the rope, till she fell from sheer exhaustion. This was repeated several times and at last the "mullahs" declared the spirit exorcised.

The Tenement and Home Life.

"The worst of the tenement is that it is a home-destroyer," writes Jacob A. Riis, the author of "How the Other Half Lives." "Whatever destroys the homes of a people, destroys surely its morals, its character, and in the end the people itself. When Rome became a city of tenements—a city without homes—it fell. How should it be otherwise? No thrift is the typical badge of tenement-house life. The husband escapes to the saloon in search of the cheer his home fails to furnish. For half the drunkenness that disgraces the tenements the ignorance of the wives is to blame. The boys and girls take to the street. It is there they receive their real bringing up, such as it is. It was said once by the superintendent of the house of refuge, who for thirty years had tried to make good boys out of bad, that it was essential to have the play of the children more carefully watched than their work. It is the utter impossibility of mond ring with which to seal the engagement, and will 'see' the tailor who made his wedding suit 'later.' And so they are launched upon the sea of matrimony amid splendors they cannot afford, loaded with debts they cannot pay; and nothing but death or the grace of God can now save them from a life of mutual recriminations and heartburnings."

A Good Wife's Influence.

A judicious wife is always clipping off from her husband's moral nature little twigs that are growing in wrong directions. She keeps him in shape by continual pruning. The wisest things a man generally does are those which his wife counsels him to do. A wife is a good wielder of the moral pruning-knife. If Oliver Goldsmith had been married he never would have worn that memorable and ridiculous coat. Whenever you find a man whom you know little about badly dressed, or talking absurdly, or exhibiting eccentricity of manner, you may be certain that he is not a married man, for the corners are not rounded off—the little shoots pared away—as in married men.

A Heroic Nurse.

Mrs. J. M. Wetmore of Washington, O., sends us this very interesting sketch of a remarkable woman: "During the war of the rebellion, Miss Lucinda Humphrey left her comfortable home in Iowa City, Ia., and went South as a nurse in a hospital, near Memphis, Tenn. She was an earnest Christian, and took a loving pleasure in reading the Bible, singing and praying for sick and wounded soldiers, and sending messages from the dying to loved ones at home. One sultry afternoon in the summer of 1864, Miss Humphrey had a number of very sick slates, bits of board and pastboard, with chalk or coal with which to draw letters or figures. Gen. Grant was deeply touched on witnessing the self-sacrificing young woman, in her endeavor to enlighten the minds of these neglected children.

"He gave Miss Humphrey $200 and requested her to rent a better school-room and buy suitable books and maps. This donation for the education of the colored children was the beginning of the Freedmen's Bureau in the South. Miss Humphrey continued teaching for sometime, then married Captain Hay. After one year of married life, she went back to Iowa and died at the home of her sister, Mrs. Casebere. Just before her death she began preparing for publication her life in the South. Her friends have never completed the work she left unfinished."

A TRIBUTE TO A MOTHER.

NEVER left my mother in my life but that she said to me, 'I want to live long enough to see you come to your Lord and to your Saviour,' writes Gen. John L. Swift. "It was the conclusion of every separation, it was the burden of every letter she wrote to me in her after life.

"On one occasion I was invited to deliver an address in Tremont Temple. The hall was crowded and the interest intense, and at a certain point the whole audience rose to their feet, surging and swaying with cheers. As I stood their alone amid this wild outburst of enthusiasm, I looked into the left gallery and saw one pale unemotional face; it was the face of my mother. She is a little woman, and it seems as if I could lift her in the palm of my hand, but she had great love and faith, and when I met her she said: 'I have given you freely, my son, to the country, but oh, if I could see you stand there and talk for your Saviour, I would ask nothing more on this earth.' And when I took my stand I went home directly to that mother.

"I don't know that I can get on with this part of the story, but you will all understand the difficulty. The stars in the skies scarcely outnumbered the prayers she had given to her Father on my behalf, and I was going home, the last one in her band of children, resolved to tell her that her Saviour was my Saviour and that her God was my God. We were all there, and unbroken and a redeemed family. She gathered me in her arms as tenderly as when I was a helpless child. There is a passage in Scripture 'Except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.' I know what that means. I know what it is to feel as a little child if my hairs are gray with the footfalls of time."

There can be no more blessed consolation for a mother in her closing days on earth than to know that the children whom she has taught at her knee, of the Saviour's love, are true Christians.

Changing Names at Marriage.

It is said that the practice of the wife assuming her husband's name at marriage originated from a Roman custom. Thus Julia and Octavia, married to Pompey and Cicero, were called by the Romans, "Julia of Pompey" and "Octavia of Cicero," and in the later times, married women in most European countries signed their names in the same manner, but omitted the "of." Against this view may be mentioned that during the sixteenth and even the beginning of the seventeenth century the usage seems doubtful, since we find Catharine Parr so signing herself after she had been twice married, and we always hear of Lady Jane Grey (not Dudley) and Arabella Stuart (not Seymour). Some people hold that the custom originated from the Scriptural teaching that husband and wife are one.

A FAMILY GROUP IN CHINESE TURKISTAN.

doing that which makes the street so dangerous. It is naturally the physical growth of the children which the tenement stunts. The lack of privacy at home, the lack of home itself, together with the influence of the street that replaces it, are leaving a stamp upon the growing generation of our city poor that is unmistakable."

Young People and Money.

"Until the boy or girl arrives at an age when it becomes necessary to earn and save, the average American youth knows no more about the proper use of money than if he or she had been dropped from the moon. How can one associate that with self-restraint," asks "The Interior," "which has hitherto been supplied only for purposes of indulgence? Many a marriage is 'a failure' just because the earlier years of the young married couple constituted a training wholly in the wrong direction. The girl has never been taught to live within an allowance; the young lover, with the natural hopefulness of youth, gets trusted for a diasoldiers under her care. She said: "I know they cannot live through the night, unless I can procure some milk for them. Seeing a cow in a pasture not far from the hospital, she determined to milk it. With pail in hand she started on her errand. The guard said, 'You will be killed if you attempt it!' She said, 'I must go; it is better for me to die in making an effort to save the lives of our sick boys.' The guard sent a number of soldier who surrounded the milkmaid at her perilous task. They went and returned in safety. That pail of delicious milk gave new life to the suffering boys. I wonder if any of the soldiers are living who were under the care of this lovely Christian girl.

"Sometime during the year 1865, or shortly after the war closed, Gen. Grant went to Memphis, Tenn. While there he heard of the opening of a school for colored children. He visited the school taught by Miss Humphrey of Iowa. Gen. Grant found her surrounded by a large class of children who were clothed in rags, and crowded into a small, uncomfortable room with but few books. The teacher was using, instead of WHAT has become of the picture that used to hang there?"

The query, faintly but coherently uttered, called the nurse to the bedside.

Mrs. Paull had slept without stirring for four hours. It was a season of suspense during which nobody but Mrs. Williams was in the room. This was by the doctor's express orders, which none—assuredly not his leal coadjutor—thought of gainsaying.

The house was as silent as the grave, and, although it was not yet noon, shades and curtains tempered the light to the dimness of evening; the woman in the chair that commanded a view of the sleeper's face, was as motionless as she whom she watched. A score of times she hushed her own breath to listen for that which was the only token of life in her patient.

One of her sayings was, "It's a thousand times easier, no matter how lazy you may be, to be up and doing, than down and waiting."

Long practice had made waiting a part of her religion. She had learned, through much tribulation and many lessons, "having done all, to stand." When God said, "Be still!" she moved not. When action no longer availed, she gave herself unto prayer, every sense on the alert for the next word of command. Resting upon her arms did not mean sleeping upon them.

Her practised ear detected instantly the alterations in Mrs. Paull's voice and articulation; the languid legato movement of the words was that of feeble but intelligent speech. Her heart gave a great bound; the hurrying blood beat upon the drums of her ears, but, without rustle or flurry, she arose and moved slowly forward. Mrs. Paull was gazing at a vacant place upon the wall over against her bed.

"We took it away because you were ill, Mrs. Paull. The less furniture there is in a sick-room the better, or so the doctors say now-a-days."

Too weak to be greatly moved by surprise or curiosity, the patient turned her eyes to the unfamiliar face.

"I must have had an unusually bad headache—have I not? It has taken all my strength, I think. Where is Elspeth? And why has she left you to take care of me?"

"Elspeth's busy getting the children's dinner ready, I guess. Shall I call her?"

"Not if she is busy. She has too much to do when I am unable to help her. But I am afraid this is an imposition upon you."

"Not a bit of it. I'm Mrs. Williams, one of your neighbors, and seeing that Elspeth didn't like to leave you alone, I offered to sit with you awhile, in case you might want a drink, or anything. The doctor was here to-day, and left this for you to take when you woke up. You'll do nicely now that the headache has gone off."

She spoke in such an easy, matter-of-course way, and her manner of offering the medicine was so free from concern, that Mrs. Paull swallowed it without remark upon the physician's visit, or his prescription. She closed her eyes and dozed for twenty minutes under the influence of the sedative; then they opened, and the perplexities dreaded by doctors and watchers under such circumstances crept darkly into their depths. She was beginning to piece together straggling thoughts, and to call memory to her help.

"Where are the children?"

"Gone to school as good as kittens—bless their hearts! That is, the boys have.

The baby was carried off by Mrs. Lanier, who wanted her to spend the day with her little girl. I heard something about Central Park, so I think there is a frolic on foot."

"Has anybody been ill except myself."

"Nobody at all! Why should they be? Headaches—even such bad ones as yours—are not catching. And you mustn't think of yourself as ill now. You're a bit tired and weak, and must lie still and eat all the nourishing food the doctor will let you have, and take all the rest the law allows. You'll be astonished to find how soon you'll be up and around."

The homely commonplaces and the smooth, leisurely enunciation of them lulled the listener temporarily. It seemed altogether proper that this comfortable-looking stranger should be there and her custodian, while Elspeth bustled about downstairs. The blackened lips relaxed into something like a smile.

"You are very kind. I am much obliged to you."

The drowsy intonation promised well, but, as before, her mind rebelled against the inertia of the body. Her brows were knitted, the lids contracted like those of a short-sighted person. The next query showed that recollections were tardy in adjusting themselves.

"Have any letters come from Mr. Paull while I was ill?"

"I haven't heard them say. 'Twasn't likely I should, being a comparative stranger although a neighbor and a well-wisher, as all neighbors ought to be, according to my way of thinking. And Mendebars Avenue has the name of being real sociable. Especially when there's sickness or the like. But there! I always say there isn't a truer word in the Bible than that 'He who would have friends, must show himself friendly.'"

She had reduced the knack of talking her patients to sleep to an art. But the pleasant monotone, almost lengthening into a drawl, the non-exciting utterances strung upon a silken string and slipped along at equal distances, failed now of their usual effect.

"Do you know whether or not my brother ordered that picture to be taken down?"

The nurse laughed, a good-humored gurgle of innocent amusement that made her incipient double chin quiver.

"I know for certain that he didn't! He doesn't even know that it is down. There never was a kinder, lovelier, attentiver brother in all the world;—that I'll testify to. He's been over every day, so they tell me, to see how you are, and if there's anything you'd like to have and all that. A great many men haven't but one idea in the world about sick people, and that's—'What'll they have to eat?' And he'd give you all of Washin'ton Market, and Fulton thrown into the bargain, if your room would hold it, and Elspeth would let you have 'em. But he'd no more to do with taking down that picture than the king of the Canary Islands wheresomever they may be. 'Twas Elspeth and me that were all the time brushing up against the frame, and shouldering of it crooked, being neither of us willows, so to speak,—no, nor yet 'syllups.' Soon's you get strong enough to set up, you shall have it back. It's only in the other room—safe's as can be."

She contrived to give this monologue the effect of dropping water, and had the satisfaction of seeing Mrs. Paull's eyelids fall slowly and remain closed; the plait between the brows was smoothed out. Another half-hour went by. Mrs. Williams was immovable, a study of charity in gray stone, after the realistic school, abundant in curves, and wise with the tender sagacity of years. Before she dared change her position, the eyes misty with sleep, opened a little way.

"Ernest wouldn't like it, I am sure," she murmured. "He gave it to me one Christmas. Ten years ago, maybe twelve. He hung it there. Where I could see it the first thing in the morning. He said it would be —the spirit of love—keeping—watch—over—me."

The last syllables were barely audible. The watcher did not move until the soft respiration assured her that slumber had again interposed a merciful screen between the spent, nervous forces and the glare of truth.

With all her natural aptitude for her calling, her tact and her skill, she was not a trained nurse. That is, she had not been graduated from a "Training School," with a diploma that gave her the right to wear kerchief and coil; to snub "unprofessionals" and awe the families of patients. She was stout in her objections to the uniform of the order, maintaining that the apparition of a hired nurse to the vision of an ill and nervous person, was in itself alarming. She would rather be taken for what she accounted herself to be—the volunteer neighbor of the sufferer—until the feeling of strangerhood wore off.

Without going to the length of equivocating to Mrs. Paull, she had succeeded in evading her catechism as to the causes for removing the portrait. It was literally true that she and Elspeth in tending the sick mistress and making the bed had once and again come in contact with the corners of the elaborately-carved and gilded frame, and that both had exclaimed at the discomfort of having it there. But on the eleventh day of her illness Mrs. Paull had conceived a sudden and violent dread of the handsome visage smiling down upon her. She hid herself shudderingly under the bed-clothes, declaring that the eyes hurt her, that the lips said cruel, mocking things, and, worst of all, that the face of a woman sneered at her over her husband's shoulder. Nor would she uncover her eyes until assured by servant and nurse that the picture was no longer there.

Marie had witnessed all this with a horror-stricken countenance, and followed Mrs. Williams as she carried the portrait into the back chamber. When it was deposited carefully upon a table, the back propped by the wall, the girl threw herself upon her knees in front of it, and kissed the pictured face over and over, and laid her cheek against it, the tears raining from her eyes.

"Poor, dear Papa! It would break his heart if he knew of this. O, Mrs. Williams, what does it all mean? Did you hear her say that he was trying to drag her heart out by the roots? He—the gentlest, kindest, most affectionate of human beings, who could never bear to see anything suffer!"

"It's oftener this way than otherwise, dear, when people's wits have been sent away by fever or anything of that sort. It's a very common thing for them to turn against the very ones they love the best. Wait until your mother is herself again, and you'll see that she'll be the first one to insist upon our bringing the portrait back. She will not have the least recollection of what has happened to-day, and we must take care that she never knows it. It would grieve her more than it does you."

The demeanor of the patient upon her return to consciousness fully justified this prediction, but to the nurse's surprise, she made no further reference to the portrait upon her second awakening. Her eyes wandered over the blank space it had once filled as listlessly as over other parts of the room.

To Mrs. Williams's proposal to Elspeth that they would better restore it to its place, the Scotchwoman replied curtly, "Bide a wee! When she asks for it again, it will be time eno' to fetch it."

That time did not come. Mrs. Paull asked for her children, smiled faintly into their awed faces; let them kiss her, and hoped in the changed voice that frightened them into decorum, that they would be "good, and not give Elspeth too much trouble"—then wearily turned away and seemed to sleep. She was composed in appearance when her brother was admitted, and calmly affectionate with her sister-in-law, thanking both for their kindness to the children and herself, but evidently indisposed to converse upon any subject whatsoever. The dull apathy that had taken the place of her natural vivacity increased as time passed, instead of wearing away with the increase of strength. When left alone with the nurse, she would lie, for hours together, staring at the ceiling, her wasted hands laid, one upon the other, over her breast, never speaking, unless directly questioned, and answering in the fewest possible words. But for the settled gloom of the dark eyes, she might have been thought to be in a trance.

Finding and leaving her thus one afternoon, Mr. Lanier signalled to Mrs. Williams to accompany him when he went downstairs. "This is an unnatural, and to me an alarming state of things," he said in strong emotion. "Surely something can and ought to be done to break it up. Will you ask Dr. Bacon if he would like to have Dr. Jayne or Dr. Steele over again? What does he think of her? What would you suggest?"

She answered the last question first,—a safe rule when the dialogue lies between a calm person and one who is laboring under powerful excitement.

"I have seen other cases, and worse, that came out straight in time. There's nothing to be done, but to wait patiently for what good nursing and tonics will do. So Dr. Bacon says, and the other doctors would agree with him? High-ups must be followed by low-downs, you see, before one gets to a healthy everidge. Mrs. Paull has a fine constitution, and then she has her children to get well for. It's a good sign—her noticing them."

"That is the doctor's opinion, you say. Do you think as he does? I would rather have the judgment of a really competent nurse than that of a whole college of physicians. You have watched Mrs. Paull closely now for nearly three weeks. Has anything occurred to you as likely to be helpful to her? If she goes on as she is now, for a week longer, she will die, or become insane."

"Shall I speak out plain, sir? You'd maybe think me too free."

"I have asked you to speak, haven't I? Excuse me if I seem irritable but I am greatly worried by all this—more than you or anyone else can imagine. I am tormented by the dread that my sister may never rally. I see no signs of convalescence other than were perceptible a week ago,—and"—falteringly,— "we have been much to one another—Alice and I. Next to my wife and children, she is the dearest thing alive to me."

The honest face before him expressed sincere and respectful sympathy. His soul must have been moved to the depths before he could admit a stranger to his confidence. She spoke simply and gravely:

"I think, Mr. Lanier, if I may be so bold, that a letter or a message from her husband would do Mrs. Paull more good than all the medicine in the drug stores in New York and Brooklyn mixed in one tonic. There's a spring broken or a band slipped off the wheel somewhere, that doctors and nurses haven't touched, and can't touch. If Mr. Paull could arrange his business matters so as to hurry home, or if he would write oftener—some men are thoughtless about such things—you'd soon see a blessed change in her."

Something so hot and bitter burst from the lips of the stately gentleman that she actually recoiled. It sounded like "Despicable hound!" but she could not be sure as to the wording of the epithet, gathering the purport more from his emphasis and countenance. He walked up and down the parlors; went into the hall; opened the front door, and stood bare-headed in the frosty air for perhaps two minutes. Then he came back.

"Again I must beg you to excuse me if I appear unreasonably irritable. There are some things which it is difficult to discuss with anybody. Family secrets ought not to be shared with any one except blood relations. And, as a family, we are disposed to be reserved—perhaps we are proud. If so, pride is likely to catch a hard fall."

He had said this, pacing the room recklessly. Now he stopped, tacing her.

"You are a widow, I believe, Mrs. Williams?"

"No, sir. That is—not by death."

The response was so direct and unlooked-for that he was abashed. Her mournful firmness had a touch of the heroic. He felt convicted of wanton cruelty.

"I beg a thousand pardons. I had supposed—"

"Most people do, sir!" interposing to save him further embarrassment. "When asked direct, I can say but the one thing, of course. But, as you say, there are sore spots in every family and every heart that it's best to keep well covered up. Now, sir, as to Mrs. Paull—if there's anything you can think of that I can do to help her—"

He came to an abrupt determination.

"You are a Christian, Mrs. Williams,—and a brave, God-fearing, tender-hearted woman, with great refinement of feeling. You are prudent, too, and, I believe, discreet, beyond the average of your sex."

Excited as he was, he could not but note that she listened as if he were praising somebody else than herself.

"Old Adam."*

BY REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, D.D., D.C.L.

OLD Adam had a room to let. He was always called old Adam, though he was still a comparatively young man. "Old" was only a term of familiarity. Adam was handy and capable. He would do many things which made him a valuable workman and useful neighbor. He occupied the top or but one in the narrow, tall, rickety house in the corner of Abel's Rents.

The man who occupied the lowest floor in the house was a cobbler; he mended shoes for the court, and he did not do much work beyond the court. He had two sons, one of whom he was bringing up in to his trade, and the other was at sea. The son who was at home was a tall, strapping fellow; and a great hero in the eyes of the bevy of small children who inhabited the floor above. These were the six children of the old-faced tailor, who had a consumptive life. Five days in the week things were not so bad, as the six children went to school; but Saturday was a whole holiday, and the noise on the staircase was terrible, for the poor woman had to wash up a bit on Saturday, and the court was the only playground. And the children would carry on their noisiest play on the staircase, using as a kind of a castle, attacking and defending it in mimic war.

On the floor above the tailor there lived two mysterious old ladies. They came and went at odd times; but as the neighbors said, "They kept themselves to themselves." Whether they were in good work or bad, whether they fared well or ill, nobody knew, though several suspected that they were not always as plentifully supplied with food as they ought to be. They certainly looked pale and worn.

The fourth floor was occupied by old Adam; and above him lived an old lady and her daughter. The old lady never went out. She was whispered to be of a fabulous age—old, old—ever so old. Ben Cobbler christened her Grannie Garret, and Grannie Garret was in the eyes of the children a sort of modern "Methoosalem," as Ben said. But however old she was, her daughter was a bright, comely-faced woman, who always inspired the children with awe and affection. These were the inhabitants of No. 5, in Abel's Rents.

Old Adam had a room to let. What did a old bachelor like Adam want with an empty room? The room did not long stand empty. It was soon rumored in the court that it was taken; much curiosity was felt about the new lodger. Some said he was Adam's brother! But that was not the case. Adam was entirely satisfied about his lodger. He had paid him a week's rent in advance, and what more was wanted? Besides the man was regular in his habits, and seemed to have regular work—as regular as old Adam himself.

The windows in No. 5 were at right angles to one another. So it happened that when old Adam flung open his window, leaning to lean out, the new lodger, opening his window at the same moment, came into full view of old Adam, and almost within reach of a handshake.

The new lodger began to unfold a crumpled newspaper.

"Got a paper?" said Adam.

"Yes, I like to read the news."

"Got my favorite paper!" said Adam.

"Always read the 'Hullabaloo,'" said the lodger.

"My paper, too!" said Adam, opening an evening paper.

Then they sat in silence till Adam folded up his newspaper, when the lodger rolled up his paper also.

"Good-night," said Adam, as he closed his window.

"Good-night," said the lodger, closing his. "Sensible man, that!" said old Adam. "Fastes like mine! I think he'll do."

After such a beginning of acquaintance, was not surprising to hear the lodgers be declaring that Adam and his lodger were getting quite friendly.

I do not know that the word was quite right one—but it was certainly not wonderful that the lodgers used it, for old Adam and his lodger moved like clockwork together.

Ben, who was a bit of a rascal, christened the new lodger "Mr. Boswell"—old Adam, being regarded as a Dr. Johnson; his name soon got shortened to "Tom Twinkle Dimes," by Rev. W. B. Carpenter, D.D., pp. 225, cloth, price $1.00. Macmillan & Co., London and New York, Publishers.

down to "old Boz," and the boys and girls soon whispered to one another "old Boz" as the lodger passed them on the stair; but later, they began to gather courage and to speak with something more than bated breath; "old Boz" was buzzed loudly from lip to lip, till one day a boy, more adventurous than the rest, shouted out, "Well, old Boz, Go to bed, old Boz."

Now no one likes to be called names, and perhaps it is not unreasonable to resent being called "old Boz," especially when one's name is Higginson.

The lodger met old Adam on the landing that night. Old Adam had heard the children's voices and the name "old Boz" shouted after his lodger.

"These children are noisy and troublesome," he said.

"They are toads!" said his lodger. "Just hear them now."

The shouts and laughter of the children were ringing through the court.

"Horrid row they are making," said Adam. "Can hardly hear one's self speak."

"A man ought to keep his brats in order," said the lodger.

"He's no right to let them be a nuisance to decent folk," said Adam.

"Let's get out of the row," said the lodger.

"All right," said Adam. "A stroll will do us good."

But when they got outside there was a chilling drizzle of annoying rain; the night, too, was raw.

An hour or two later, Adam and his lodger were coming home. They walked arm-in-arm and were more affectionate than usual. They gushed in their confidences and exchanged grumbles about the rough work of their life—work was detestable, weather abominable, children were worthless and noisy brats. They were not in the mood to bear things equably; and, alas! the staircase, when they reached their house, was swarming with the children.

On they came, and tiny little things as some of them were, they fairly swept the two men off their feet, and sent them stumbling, rolling, and bumping down the last step or two. It was not much of a fall; had it been worse, however it might have been better. It was not bad enough to sober or to stun; it was just bad enough to anger. Furious, lost to all thought of the children, they rose and flung them in a huddled pile together. In another minute they were launching out their wrath on the poor pale-faced tailor and his paler wife.

When these wild and wrathful men had said their say they bounced out the door, not waiting for a reply. Up the stairs they came, the lodger whispering hoarsely his indignant comments—worthless, miserable creatures—not fit to be allowed room in decent houses—unwholesome lot altogether. On the landing they met old Grannie Garret's daughter. As she passed, she scanned old Adam's face doubtfully, as if she scarcely recognised him, and then swiftly and silently passed on, going down the stairs. Presently all was silent; the children had been gathered in, and the last lodgers had tramped to their rooms, the clouds had passed from the sky, the stars came out, and a gentle moon poured a quiet beam in at the window where old Adam sat.

What was he thinking of, and why did the moonbeams puzzle and trouble him? Does a man like to say that he was wrong? If old Adam had not disliked saying it, I think it was what he might have said. At any rate, the moonbeam, as it stole about the still and silent room, made things seem different. His room was looking shabbier than he thought it was. He had always been proud of his little room. "I am a beast," said old Adam. With that he got up and walked about his little room. "What has come to me?" he asked. "What has come to my room? Why, it's not like the same place! And I am not like the same man. I am an ass," and then as he caught sight of the thorn-crowned head on the mantel, he said, "I'll go downstairs. Poor little brats! they meant no harm. I'd better have brought them up here for a game. That would have been more like what he'd have done. I will. I'll go down."

And downstairs old Adam went, but when he reached the poor tailor's door, he was ashamed to go in. He listened, and all was quiet. Was it? No! there was a sound within, a footstep behind the door, a murmur of voices, then the opening door.

Old Adam fell back into the shadow. The light from the opened door showed him Grannie Garret's daughter. The little tailor was letting her out.

"They are troublesome, I know," the little tailor was saying. "But what can I do? I hardly get enough work as I will, and as for my poor wife—," and here the thin, weary voice broke a little.

But Grannie Garret's daughter was not going to let him give way.

"Well, I'll look in in the morning and see them ready and tidy. Don't you let your wife get up. We'll try and keep them quiet. Poor wee bairns! it's dull enough for them. But they'll be a help to you yet."

"Good-night," said the little tailor, holding the sputtering, wind-waved candle high and looking at her face. "You're a good woman," he said.

"Nonsense," said Grannie Garret's daughter; don't you think anything of that. I don't think anything of the little trouble to-night. Old Adam's a good sort. It's that lodger that has set him wrong. If he has only courage to follow what he knows he might be, he'll shake off old Boz. And anyway, it'll be all right. Don't you be uneasy about the landlord and that."

Good-night was said again, the door was closed, and old Adam saw her pass up the stairs. Then he followed quietly.

He thought she had gone further, but when he reached the next landing he saw her standing and lifting her hand to knock at the door where the two mysterious sisters lived. He was at the top of the stairs when the moon flashed out a beam which fell on his face, and Grannie Garret's daughter saw him. "Don't knock," he said; tell me how they are. I saw you come out. I wanted to know. What a beast I am! What a good woman you are!"

"Nonsense!" said she. The children are all fast asleep. Poor little souls! They cried sadly after their beating. "But there, I must run out again."

"Out again!" cried old Adam. "At this time? What in the world for?"

"Oh!" she said. "It may not need going out, I was going to say, unless you have a loaf of bread you can lend me."

"I have," said old Adam. "You shall have it, and welcome. I'll bring it up to your room."

"No!" she said. "It's downstairs I want it: can you bring it?"

"What, here?" said old Adam.

"Yes, here, sir, if you will—here," she added. "They have had no food all day, I fear. I think things will mend with them after a little, for I've heard of the right work for them. They are wonderfully clever; they can do the most beautiful lace!"

Old Adam fetched the loaf, and as he gave it to her—"Will you give them an order? I want a lace collar. I'll give five dollars for it."

Old Adam looked awkward. She said, "Good-night. I must go. I live higher than you."

"Yes," he said; "nearer heaven, I know."

Her foot was on the stair. She looked back at him. The moonbeams were dancing about the little landing. "You must be very happy!" he said, putting his great foot on the staircase alongside her. "What is the secret of it?"

Then she put out her hand; in the moonlight they joined their hands.

The next morning old Adam found the key of his lodger's door lying outside his own. The lodger had disappeared. There was great joy among the children.

Things mended in Abel's Rents. A little sea-air did a world of good to the tailor's wife: regular work made the faces of the mysterious sisters almost plump; Grannie Garret's daughter went out with her lace collar on one morning, and came back with a gold ring besides. No new lodger was allowed in old Adam's vacant room. It was always useful, for the tailor's children often played there.

A MISSIONARY VISIT TO A DIVE.*

ONE rather sultry night in the early spring, May 25, 1891, a little band of Workers accompanied me down to the slums in the lower part of New York. From place to place we went, until we finally found ourselves entering a low sub-cellar in Mulberry street. Upon descending, the room seemed somewhat crowded with a rather disorderly and excited set (mostly men), talking, smoking and swearing. The atmosphere was somewhat dense, and for a moment we did little but stand still and look at the motley group who closed in upon us. Some savage, cruel faces looked into ours, while others less interested stood aloof, or were so occupied with their own wretchedness as to pay little attention to the visitors.

As a rule, we had permission to hold a short service there, but that particular night we were not even allowed to sing; and, in fact, made to understand our presence was not desired for many minutes.

A gang of thieves surrounded us; although unaware of it then, we could not but be forcibly impressed with the one regarded as "the woman of the crowd." She appeared to be spokesman, leader and all. She kept very close to me, and, as I looked upon her poor, bruised face, with those ugly black marks under her eyes, I saw a bad cut on the forehead, and that part of her hair had actually been pulled out by the roots, while the side of her ear showed another bad scar, from a former fight, as she afterward explained. The remainder of her hair was hanging loosely down the back, over a dirty blue cotton dress.

As she stood there, her wild, penetrating eyes were fastened on my face, and something I can never describe drew me to her in such love and pity that then and there I felt she must be saved.

As we turned, somewhat disheartened, to go up the street, she followed very closely behind. The reason I never knew until months later; it was this: That very day two of the gang she belonged to had been arrested, and the remaining ones were so incensed, and, being more or less under the influence of liquor, she feared they might revenge themselves upon some of us. Recognizing that we were Christians, and down there for good purposes, she determined to protect us, and if any one got hurt, as she said, when speaking of that night, they would have to strike her first.

There was a wild look of boldness upon the countenance of the weird-looking girl, mixed with reckless courage. When on the sidewalk, she proposed going with us into some of the opium joints on Mott street. Knowing well it was not customary for even Christian workers to enter such places without detectives, she peered silently into our faces for a moment, awaiting the reply; then, thinking possibly fear might deter us from accepting the proposition, she tossed her head disdainfully, and said: "Ah, come along: I'm neither afraid of man, God nor the devil."

HUMANITY IN WAR.†

That general is the greatest who, careless of his own blood, spares the lives of his men; who, despising the éclat of a bloody field, fights only when he has an object for victory. Measured by the meagre resources available, by the indifferent trust in him, Joseph E. Johnston will be treated in history as equally great in the defense and in the aggressive—as much entitled to be called the sword of the Confederacy as its shield.

He was an utter stranger to that ambition which has actuated so many of the great soldiers of history. He had no ambition, save to do right, and to serve his country to the best of his ability. The only renown which he coveted was the approval of his own conscience, and the good opinion of his countrymen. He sought no opportunity for mere military distinction, apart from the good of his country. He sacrificed no human life for mere glory. When a word from him might have raised such a protest from his army in Georgia, that President Davis could not have disregarded it, he did not speak it. When he was urged, at the last, to continue the war, and might have done so without the responsibility for its continuance, and might have served as a rallying point for those who at least wished to die a glorious death, he took the ground that it would be the highest of human crimes to continue the contest, and relegated himself to private life by his own will, as modestly and as nobly as Washington on surrendering his commission. How incomparably greater is the man who can act thus, than he whose fame is perpetuated by pyramids of human skulls and the ashes of burning cities!

THE MAKER OF THE EYE.‡

It is through concrete examples that the most vivid impression is made of the design exhibited in nature. The human eye and ear furnish familiar and striking illustrations of a preconceived plan. The eye is protected by a lid which moves with great quickness, and is open and shut at our pleasure. This delicate organ is thus defended from harm, as we take care to shield optical instruments from injury. When the eye itself is examined, it is found to be almost spherical in form. It is discovered to be a darkened chamber—a camera obscura, having in the anterior part a bi-convex lens, which is named the crystalline lens, by which objects are focussed on the sensitive surface of a membrane called the retina. The eyeball, instead of being in a fixed position, has muscles attached to it; and can be turned in different directions, corresponding to the place of objects in the field of vision—as a photographer's instrument can be turned upward or downward, to the right hand or the left. The requisite refraction of the rays of light, whereby they are brought to a focus and form an image on the retina is effected by their passage through the cornea, the transparent coating of the eyeball, the aqueous humor, the crystalline lens and the vitreous humor. The special use of the lens is in accommodating the eye to objects at different distances, since, when it is removed by an operation for cataract, the power of vision is not lost. The interior of the eye is darkened by the pigmented choroid lining and by the iris, the continuation of it. In the centre of the iris is the pupil, an aperture for admitting the light; and the iris itself, by means of two systems of muscular fibres, contracts or dilates the pupil, according as the light is more or less intense. The retina is so made that it is stimulated by the impact of light upon it, and there ensues an excitation of the fibres of the optic nerve. When waves of light of different lengths infringe on the retina, special effects are produced, giving in sensation the different colors. The apparatus for obtaining images of objects near and far is one of the most curious features in the structure of the eye. In optical instruments, in order to obtain a distinct image, the distance between the lens and the surface on which the image is to be formed has to be increased or lessened by moving either this surface or the lens forward or backward. In this way the photographer adjusts his instrument. The focal point of the lens is made to correspond with the plate. In the eye there is a peculiar mechanism by which a like result is effected. This mechanism causes the lens to become more convex when a near object is to be looked at. The lens is placed between two layers of suspensory ligament, which is a prolongation of the choroid, one of three interior coats of the eye. With this ligament is connected the ciliary muscle, which, when it is lax, leaves the lens in the compressed state. But when a near object is to be viewed this muscle pulls upon the choroid, relaxes the ligament, and the lens forthwith bulges out. Here is a self-adjusting apparatus, by which the eye accommodates itself to the perception of things not far off.

NIBSY THE NEWSBOY.*

With hook and axes the firemen rushed in; hose was let down through the man-holes, and down there in the depths, the battle was fought and won. The building was saved; but in the midst of the rejoicing over the victory there fell a sudden silence. From the cellar-way, a grimy, helmeted figure arose, with something black and scorched in his arms. A tarpaulin was spread upon the snow and upon it he laid his burden, while the silent crowd made room and word went over to the hospital for the doctor to come quickly.

Very gently they lifted poor little Nibsy—for it was he, caught in his berth by a worse enemy than the "cop" or the watchman of the hay-barge—into the ambulance that bore him off to the hospital cot, too late.

Conscious only of a vague discomfort that had succeeded terror and pain, Nibsy wondered uneasily why they were all so kind. Nobody had taken the trouble to as much as notice him before. When he had thrust his papers into their very faces they had pushed him roughly aside. Nibsy, unhurt and able to fight his way, never had a show. Sick and maimed and sore, he was being made much of, though he had been caught where the boys were forbidden to go. Things were queer, anyhow, and—

The room was getting so dark that he could hardly see the doctor's kindly face, and had to grip his hand tightly to make sure that he was there; almost as dark as the stairs in the alley he had come down in such a hurry.

There was the baby now—poor baby—and mother—and then a great blank, and it was all a mystery to poor Nibsy no longer. For, just as the wild-eyed woman pushed her way through the crowd of nurses and doctors to his bedside, crying for her boy, Nibsy gave up his soul to God.

You can buy a chimney to fit your lamp that will last till some accident happens to it. Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass" is that chimney.

You can have it—your dealer will get it—if you insist on it. He may tell you it costs him three times as much as some others. That is true. He may say they are just as good. Don't you believe it—they may be better for him; he may like them better.

I NEED THY CARE.

O God! how much I need thy care,
Thou knowest more than words can tell;
To guard me from each sinful snare
And save my soul from depths of hell.

need thee with each rising day—
Yes; every hour I need thy hand
To guide my feet o'er life's rough way,
And all thy precepts understand.

will not fail, Lord, nor fall
Whilst thou dost linger by my side;
I'll sing to thee, my all in all,
And in thy promise will abide.

And when upon thy rock at last,
My sinless soul shall anchored be;
Triumphant, with all dangers past,
I'll hail thy blest eternity.

LIFE-SAVING DEVICES.

Inventors have been stimulated to increased effort in the production of life-saving devices by the terrible destruction which occurred when the English battle-ship "Victoria" was rammed by her sister ship and sank with nearly all hands. It is quite natural that such calamities should suggest the providing of precautions against them, and it is strange that the most common of all calamities—the loss of the soul, does not lead more people to take the assured and untrailing means provided to prevent the catastrophe in their own case. Among the devices which the English government is being urged to adopt is a raft of novel construction composed of steel in cellular compartments, capable of resisting any amount of rough usage. Even if the air-chambers be damaged, there will still be sufficient floating power to support a number of persons, the surplus buoyancy being so great that it would be impossible to swamp or overturn the craft, even when it is crowded. The invention is especially adapted for the landing of troops, horses, guns, cargoes, etc., and the rafts can be fitted for use on any vessel. Another contrivance which, in the opinion of naval experts, would obviate much of the loss of life which now yearly takes place at sea, is a raft of another kind which might in ordinary circumstances take the place of a captain's bridge. It runs nearly the whole length of the ship, and in case of accident two men, one at each end, by moving a lever could cause the whole construction to glide into the water, where it would constitute a completely fitted raft, equal to the reception of almost any number of passengers, and ready for use. Should, however, a calamity occur in which there was no time to loosen the raft, the construction with all the passengers on it, would float off bodily as the vessel went down.

THE DEPTHS OF THE BIBLE.

Mr. D. L. Moody, the famous evangelist, has a unique way of dealing with sceptical people. He gives the following interesting incident:

"I pity the man who knows all the Bible, for it is a pretty good sign he doesn't know himself. A man came to me with what he thought was a very difficult passage, and he said, 'Mr. Moody, how do you explain it?' I said, 'I don't explain it.' But how do you interpret it?' 'I don't interpret it.' 'Well, how do you understand it?' 'I don't understand it.' 'But what do you do with it?' 'I don't do anything with it.' 'You don't believe it?'"

"Yes, I believe it. There are lots of things that I believe that I do not understand. In the third chapter of John, Christ says to Nicodemus, 'If you do not understand earthly things, how can you understand heavenly things?' There are a great many things about my own body I do not understand; I don't understand nature; it is filled with wonderful things I don't comprehend. Then why should I expect to know everything spiritually?"

"But men ask, 'How can you prove the book is inspired?' I answer, because it inspires me. That is one of the best proofs. It does inspire us."

THE NEW ASSAULT.

In an interesting talk in "McClure's Magazine" on the new religious movements, Dr. John Hall says: There are here and there so-called "new religious movements" being developed, and even organizations formed, in view of which some are despondent as to the future of our evangelical faith. Spiritualism, "Christian Science," and the like, are specimens. I have no fear about the issue, although troubled over those who are fascinated by these plausible substitutes for the religion of the Bible. Time was when atheism and infidelity stood boldly in front of advancing truth, and tried to throw it back. The prince of this world is cunning enough to know that such policy is now practically useless. He does not assail religion as in other days, but tries to get worthless substitutes for it. The train could not be met and stopped, but ingenuity may put down some new rails and get it off the track. But these revivals of old human speculations will have their day and disappear. This will not be from the inherent energy of the Church, but from the power of God the Holy Spirit working through the truth: and it is not a hope built on the zeal, fidelity, and consecration of our denominations, for we are from being up to the standard fixed by the Church's Head, and are too much inclined to formalism and the teachings of worldly wisdom, but it is based on the infallible truth that "the Lord reigneth."

A PROXY WANTED.

The erroneous idea that it is possible to compound with God for neglected duties by the payment of money, which is common among ourselves, is more openly avowed in Japan. The only difference between the practice in the two lands is the frankness of avowal in the Japanese case. It is so much easier to many men to pay money than to live the life of holiness and helpfulness, which is required of us, that it is not strange that the attempt should be made to reach the same reward by the easier and more pleasant process. It is strange, however, that in America—a land of Bibles and preachers—so many should so misunderstand the character of God as to think that he can be bribed. This is the way the principle is applied in Japan: A Kobe paper publishes this advertisement, inserted by a rich man at Matsuragata, Nagasaki: "When my daughter was sick I prayed the Kompira of Saauki province for her recovery, pledging to let her pay a thanksgiving visit to the temple by creeping on her hands and feet all the way through, in imitation of cattle, if she recovered. The prayer was heard, and she recovered by the miraculous influence of the Almighty Deity. But, after, all, it is impossible for a tender girl to creep several hundreds of miles to Saauki. I should, therefore, like to find a substitute for her, and if any one offering himself or herself for such be found suitable to the task, I will pay such a person 1,000 dollars."

A PROFLIGATE'S FAREWELL.

An English journal reports the finding on the banks of the Thames a hat and a coat with an open letter, and subsequently the body of a suicide. The letter stated that four years previously the writer was living in a country village a quiet, industrious life. Unexpectedly a fortune of a hundred thousand fell into his hands and he went up to London to enjoy himself. Four years sufficed to bring him to the end of his fortune and his life. "Good-bye now," wrote the suicide, "to friends and foes. I have come to the end of my journey. But before I go, let me give one word of warning to young men. Be warned by my fate and avoid betting and the race-courses as you would poison. There are thousands of low-cunning blackguards frequenting the race-course who live upon the stupidity of men like myself. They live to lie, and cheat, and blaspheme, utterly regardless of a hereafter. I have lunched with princesses, dukes and lords, and have assisted to swell their ill-gotten gains."

AN INDIAN BOY'S FESTIVAL.

At the Indian Industrial School at Carlisle, Pa., a few days ago, a very interesting event occurred, being a festival in the arrangements for which four Circles of King's Daughters co-operated with the Indian boys in the school. It was probably the first occasion of the kind in which the young wards of the nation had ever participated. The people in that section took a most active interest in it, and it was a complete success. The event will furnish the young students with material for many letters to their parents, who are scattered among the different tribes in the West and Southwest.

BEGIN THE DAY.

Begin the day with God!
He is the sun and day;
He is the radiance of thy dawn;
To him address thy lay.

Take thy first walk with God!
Let him go forth with thee:
By stream, or sea, or mountain-path,
Seek still his company.

Thy first transaction be
With God himself above;
So shall thy business prosper well,
And all the day be love.

Indisputable Evidence

Of the Successful Treatment of Consumption and Chest Diseases by the English Method, as Discovered and Practised by George Thomas Congreve.

FOURTH INTERVIEW.

With REV. W. JOHNSTONE, Chaplain, East Poor House, Dundee. (This case appeared in the Appendix to Mr. Congreve's work on Consumption, p. 70.)

In August last, I was privileged to have a chat with the Rev. W. Johnstone, Chaplain of the East Poor House, Dundee, and from him I learned something of the class of persons among whom his life was spent. Two facts made a great impression on me. The first, that in this one workhouse the average number of deaths is something between one hundred and sixty, and one hundred and ninety annually; and the other, that in almost every case drink is primarily responsible for the loss of health, friends, and means, which precedes admission into the infirmary.

But I did not find my way to the house of the Rev. W. Johnstone, in Morgan-street, Dundee, merely to talk about the sad nature of his duties as Chaplain to the Poor-house, or the cause which brought so many to seek a shelter within its walls. I was concerned more closely with inquiries as to the reverend gentleman's health, both past and present.

On referring to the case as reported in the Appendix (Case No. 192), there is hereditary tendency to decline in Mr. Johnstone's family—various relatives had died. About the year 1885 he himself broke down in health, and began to take Mr. Congreve's medicine. After a time he decided to come to London for purposes of examination and consultation. The result of this showed that the right lung was diseased.

"Now, Mr. Johnstone, that I may be able to tell it for the advantage of others whose sufferings are similar to your own, please inform me what was the result of your following out the course of treatment prescribed for you by Mr. Congreve?"

"The result was that I was quite cured. I was able, in April, 1887, to write to Mr. Congreve and inform him that I had passed through the previous winter stronger than I had been for seven years, although it was no uncommon thing for me to take three and sometimes as many as four services each Sabbath. At the same time, in addition to my own duties, I was assisting others engaged in Christian work."

"Then, I suppose, I may take it that you have had no relapse?" was my next question.

"None whatever. I kept quite well, and able to perform all my ministerial duties, and some of them (as we were remarking a few minutes ago) are not of the most pleasant kind."

"Am I right in saying that some years since one of your sons was also under Mr. Congreve for some time?"

"Yes; that was Tom."

"And was the treatment equally efficacious in his case?"

"Oh, yes; I am thankful to say he is all right. After my own experience you will not be surprised to hear that I have recommended Mr. Congreve's treatment very frequently. What astonishes me, however, is the way people seem to postpone applying until the very last—often until all hope is gone. I have a case in my mind at the present moment of a young woman whose father could not be persuaded to try Mr. Congreve's medicine, until the last moment, when his daughter was dying. As a fact, I don't think she lived long enough to take half the first bottle of medicine; but even this man acknowledged that it had relieved her sufferings—that it had greatly mitigated the terrible cough she had."

Mr. Johnstone and I chatted for some few minutes upon this inexplicable reluctance to try, until too late, a remedy which has proved successful in so many thousands of cases, and then we parted—he expressing his thanks for the benefit he and his had derived from Mr. Congreve's treatment. I meanwhile thinking what a blessed thing it was that a life like his—a life devoted to ministering to the out-cast and the suffering—should have been so providentially preserved.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all few lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts. as the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of 50 cts., $1.00 $1.75, $3.00 or $5.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSONQUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION*MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Combing, an incomplete tangle was accidentally pulled on the back of the head, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. The new discovery of MODENE was made. It is a delicate, pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for this purpose, and its scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth is light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SPRINGS FROM THE SKIN.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modeene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modeene to destroy its growth. Modeene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. Correspondence secretly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTRY AND CITY.) Cut this advertisement out.

OUR "FOOD FUND" AT WORK.

Any Destitute Families Relieved, but Thousands Behind them Appealing for Help—
"The Christian Herald" District Visitors Among the Starving in the West-side Tenements—A Work in which All may Aid—The Fund Growing Daily.

CAST thy bread upon the waters,
Ye who have but scant supply:
Angel eyes will watch above it,
You shall find it by and by.

Never has there been a season more replete with opportunities of doing good to others than now, when grim poverty is pinching hard upon the poor. Never a season when the Christian matron, the man of business, and all who are blessed with a sufficiency of the good things of this life, could exercise the virtue of generosity to such advantage. Never a season when even the poor themselves, who have barely what they may need for their own wants, could by a noble self-denial, help one even they may have a crumb to spare, and, like the "widow's mite," the giving of it will be esteemed as congested metropolis, which, at the present moment, is struggling with the problem of providing not only for its own poor, but for a very large number from other states who, coming here in the expectation of employment, have drifted into the ranks of the destitute. This class is specially worthy of being remembered by our friends in other states, who may feel disposed to help them.

Last week the Food Fund began work in earnest. From its headquarters at No. 208 Eighth Avenue, New York City, where it has established a Relief Station, it sent forth its District Visitors among the tenements of the West-side, and searched out the deserving poor in their own cheerless homes, bringing to them not only words of hope and comfort but substantial assurances of relief as well. Hundreds of families thus visited have been supplied within a few hours after the call, by our Relief wagon, each home receiving enough to last at least three days. Bread, flour in bags, meat, soup-bones, rice, condensed milk, beans, tea, coffee, and sugar are supplied in the very lowest rates from the wholesale dealers—in some cases, even lower, when the dealer is disposed to be charitable—a dollar's worth of provisions will go very far in the work of relief. A close, practical estimate places the cost of a single meal to one person at less than three cents. For twenty-five cents a family of five can be fed for one day, and one dollar will feed four such families one day, or one family of five for four days. The usual supply for a family of five or more is calculated to last beans, two pounds of rice, two ounces of tea, half pound sugar, one can condensed milk, one soup-meat bone. Where there is an invalid, a portion of fresh meat or dried fish is added. This food is plain, but wholesome and nourishing,

THE "FOOD FUND" WAGON ON ITS ROUNDS.

and with the simplest cooking can easily be made into half a dozen satisfying meals for the family. Every reader of THE CHRIS-TIAN HERALD who sends one dollar to the "Food Fund" will have the pleasure of knowing that that dollar feeds parents and babies in a hunger-stricken home for half a week at least. It will be the equivalent of forty meals at 2½ cents a piece. Every half dollar sent to the Fund will purchase twenty meals of the same sort, and every quarter will mean a gift of ten meals to the hungry mothers and children. A single dime will feed four at a sitting! A nickel, in the same providential ratio, will spread a table for two! If every reader of this journal were to contribute the cost of a single meal, the "Food Fund" would be enabled to supply the wants of 420,000 individuals, or 150,000 families for a single day, or over 30,000 families for a whole week, Sunday included.

FESTIVITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Text: Luke 14: 17: "Come, for all things are now ready."

It was one of the most exciting times in English history when Queen Elizabeth visited Lord Leicester at Kenilworth Castle. The moment of her arrival was considered so important that all the clocks of the castle were stopped, so that the hands might point to that one moment as being the most significant of all. She was greeted to the gate with floating islands, and torches, and the thunder of cannon, and fireworks that set the night ablaze, and a great burst of music that lifted the whole scene into perfect enchantment. Then she was introduced in a dining-hall, the luxuries of which astonished the world; four hundred servants waited upon the guests: the entertainment cost five thousand dollars each day. Lord Leicester made that great supper in Kenilworth Castle.

Cardinal Wolsey entertained the French ambassadors at Hampton Court. The best cooks in all the land prepared for the banquet; purveyors went out and traveled all the kingdom over to find spoils for the table. The time came. The guests were kept during the day hunting in the king's park, so that their appetites might be keen; and then, in the evening, to the sound of the trumpeters, they were introduced into a hall hung with silk and cloth of gold, and there were tables aglitter with imperial plate, and laden with the rarest of meats, and a-blush with the costliest wines; and when the second course of the feast came, it was found that the articles of food had been fashioned into the shape of men, birds, and beasts, and groups dancing, and jousting parties riding against each other with lances. Lords, and princes, and ambassadors, out of cups filled to the brim, drank the health, first of the king of England, and next of the king of France. Cardinal Wolsey prepared that great supper in Hampton Court.

But I have to tell you of a grander entertainment. My Lord, the King, is the banqueter. Angels are the cup-bearers. All the redeemed are the guests. The halls of eternal love, frescoed with light, and paved with joy, and curtained with unfading beauty, are the banqueting place. The harmonies of eternity are the music. The chalices of heaven are the plate: and I am one of the servants coming out with both hands tilted with invitations, scattering them everywhere; and oh, that for yourselves, you might break the seal of the invitation and read the words written in red ink of blood by the tremulous hand of a dying Christ: "Come now, for all things are ready."

There have been grand entertainments where a taking off—the wine gave out, or the servants were rebellious, or the light failed; but I have gone all around about this subject and looked at the redemption which Christ has provided, and I come here to tell you it is complete, and I swing open the door of the feast, telling you that, "All things are now ready."

In the first place, I have to announce that the Lord Jesus Christ himself is ready. Cardinal Wolsey came into the feast after the first course; he came in booted and spurred, and the guests arose and cheered him. But Christ comes in at the very beginning of the feast; aye, he has been waiting eighteen hundred and ninety-four years for his guests. He has been standing on his mangled feet; he has had his sore hand on his punctured side; or he has been pressing his lacerated temples—waiting, waiting. It is wonderful that he has not been impatient, and that he has not said, "Shut the door, and let the laggard stay out;" but he has been waiting. No banqueter ever waited for his guests so patiently as Christ has waited for us. To prove how willing he is to receive us, I gather all the tears that rolled down his cheeks in sympathy for your sorrows; I gather all the drops of blood that channelled his brow, and his back, and his hands and feet, in trying to purchase your redemption; I gather all the groans that he uttered in midnight chill, and in mountain hunger, and in desert loneliness, and twist them into one cry—bitter, agonizing, overwhelming. I gather all the pains that shot from spear, and spike, and cross, jolting into one pang—remorseless, grinding, excruciating. I take that one drop of sweat on his brow, and under the Gospel glass that drop enlarges until I see in it lakes of sorrow and an ocean of agony. That Being standing before you now, emaciated, and gashed, and gory, coaxes for your love with a pathos in which every word is a heart-break and every sentence a martyrdom. How can you think he trifles!

Ahasuerus prepared a feast for one hundred and eighty days; but this feast is for all eternity. Lords and princes were invited to that; you, and I, and all our world are invited to this. Christ is ready. You know that the banqueters of olden time used to wrap themselves in robes prepared for the occasion; so, my Lord Jesus hath wrapped himself in all that is beautiful. See how fair he is! His eye, his brow, his cheek, so radiant that the stars have no gleam, and the morning no brilliancy compared with it. His face reflecting all the joys of the redeemed, his hand having the omnipotent surgery with which he opened blind eyes, and straightened crooked limbs, and hoisted the pillars of heaven, and swung the twelve gates which are twelve pearls. There are not enough cups in heaven to dip up this ocean of beauty. There are not ladders enough to scale this height of love. There are not enough cymbals to clap, or harps to thrum, or trumpets to peal forth the praises of this One altogether fair. Oh, thou flower of eternity, thy breath is the perfume of heaven! Oh, blissful daybreak, let all people clap their hands in thy radiance! Chorus! Come, men, and saints, and cherubim, and seraphim, and archangel—all heights, all depths, all immensities. Chorus! Roll him through the heavens in a chariot of universal acclaim, over bridges of hosannas, under arches of coronation, along by the great towers chiming with eternal jubilee. Chorus! "Unto him who hath loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, to him be glory, world without end!"

I have a word of five letters, but no sheet white enough on which to write it, and no pen good enough with which to inscribe it. Give me the fairest leaf from the heavenly records—give me the pencil with which the angel records his victory—and then, with my hand strung to supernatural ecstasy, and my pen dipped in the light of the morning, I will write it out in capitals of love:

"J-E-S-U-S." It is this One, infinitely fair, to whom you are invited. Christ is waiting for you; waiting as a banqueter waits for the delayed guest—the meats smoking, the beakers brimming, the minstrels with fingers on the stiff string, waiting for the clash of the hoofs at the gateway. Waiting for you, as a mother waits for her son who went off ten years ago, dragging her bleeding heart along with him. Waiting! O! give me a comparison intense enough, hot enough, importunate enough to express my meaning—something high as heaven, and deep as hell, and long as eternity. Not hoping that you can help me with such a comparison, I will say: "He is waiting as only the all-sympathetic Christ can wait for the coming back of a lost soul."

Bow the knee and kiss the Son,
Come, and welcome, sinner; come.

Again, the Holy Spirit is ready. Why is it that so many sermons drop dead—that Christian songs do not get their wing under the people—that so often prayer goes no higher than a hunter's "holloa?" It is because there is a link wanting—the work of the Holy Spirit. Unless that Spirit give grapping hooks to a sermon, and lift the prayer, and waft the song, everything is a dead failure. That Spirit is willing to come at our call and lead you to eternal life; or ready to come with the same power with which he unhorsed Saul on the Damascus turnpike, and broke down Lydia in her fine store, and lifted the three thousand from midnight into noon at the Pentecost. With that power the Spirit of God now beats at the gate of your soul. Have you not noticed what homely and insignificant instrumentality the Spirit of God employs for man's conversion? There was a man on a Hudson River boat to whom a tract was offered. With indignation he tore it up and threw it overboard. But one fragment lodged on his coat-sleeve; and he saw on it the word "eternity;" and he found no peace until he was prepared for that great future. Do you know what passage it was that caused Martin Luther to see the truth? "The just shall live by faith." Do you know there is one—just one—passage that brought Augustine from a life of dissipation? "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make no provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." It was just one passage that converted Hedley Vicars, the great soldier, to Christ: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." Do you know that the Holy Spirit used one passage of Scripture to save Jonathan Edwards? "Now, unto the King, eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, our Saviour, be glory." One year ago on Thanksgiving day, I read for my text: "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever." And there is a young man in the house to whose heart the Holy Spirit took that text for his eternal redemption. I might speak of my own case. I will tell you I was brought to the peace of the Gospel through the Syro-Phœnician woman's cry to Christ: "Even the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the Master's table."

Do you know that the Holy Spirit almost always uses insignificant means? Eloquent sermons never save anybody; metaphysical sermons never save anybody; philosophical sermons never save anybody. But the minister comes some Sabbath to his pulpit, worn out with engagements and the jangling of a frenzied door bell; he has only a text and two or three ideas, but he says: "O Lord, help me. Here are a good many people I may never meet again. I have not much to say. Speak thou through my poor lips;" and before the service is done there are tearful eyes and a solemnity like the judgment. The great French orator, when the dead king lay before him, looked up and cried: "God only is great;" and the triumph of his eloquence has been told by the historians. But I have not heard that one soul was saved by the oratorical flourish. Worldly critics may think that the early preaching of Thomas Chalmers was a masterpiece. But Thomas Chalmers says he never began to preach until he came out of the sick room, white and emaciated, and told men the simple story of Jesus. In a great day of eternity, it will be found that the most souls have been brought to Christ, not by the Bossuets, and Massillons, and Bourdaloues, but by humble men who, by the strength of God, and believing in the eternal Spirit, invited men to Jesus. There were wise salves—there were excellent comments, I suppose, in the time of Christ, for blind or inflamed eyes. But Jesus turned his back upon them, and put the tip of his finger to his tongue, and then, with the little that adhered to the finger, he anointed the eyes of the blind man, and daylight poured into his blinded soul. So it is now that the Spirit of God takes that humble prayer-meeting talk, which seems to be the very salve of Christian influence, and anoints the eyes of the blind, and pours the sunlight of peace and peace upon the soul. Oh, my friends, wish we could feel it more and more, if any good is done it is by the power of God's omnipotent Spirit. I do not know what hymn may bring you to Jesus. I do not know what words of the Scripture I read may save your soul. Perhaps the Spirit of God may hurl the very truth into your heart: "Come, for all things are now ready."

Again, the Church is ready. Oh, if I could take the curtain off these Christian hearts, I could show you a great many anxieties for your redemption. You think that old man is asleep, because his head down and his eyes are shut. No, he is praying for your redemption, and hoping that the words spoken may strike your heart. Do you know the air is full of prayer? Do you know that prayer is going from Fulton Street prayer-meeting, and from Friday evening prayer-meeting, and going up every hour of the day for the redemption of the people? And if you should just stand toward the door of the Christian Church, how quickly it would fly open. Hundreds of people would say: "Give that man room at the sacrament. Bring the silver bowl of his baptism. Give him the right hand of Christian fellowship. Bring him into Christian associations." Oh, you wanderer on the cold mountains, come into the warm sheepfold. I let down the bars and bid you come in. With the Shepherd's crook I point you the way. Hundreds of Christian hands beckon you into the Church of God. A great many people, not like the Church, and say it is a great mass of hypocrites; but it is a glorious Church with all its imperfections. Christ bought it, and hoisted the pillars, and swung its gates, and lifted its arches, and curtained it with upholstery crimson with crucifixion carnage. Come into it.

We are a garden walled around Chosen and made peculiar ground;
A little spot enclosed by grace,
Out of the world's wild wilderness.

Again, the angels of God are ready. A great many Christians think that the tale about angels is fanciful. You say it is very good subject for theological student who have just begun to sermonize; but for older men it is improper. There is no more proof in that Bible that there is a God than that there are angels. Why, do not the swarm about Jacob's ladder? Are we not told that they conducted Lazarus upward that they stand before the throne, their face covered up with their wing, while they cry, "Holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty!" Did not David see thousands and thousands? Did not one angel slay one hundred and eighty-five thousand men in Sennacherib's army? And shall they not be the chief harvesters at the Judgment?

There is a line of loving, holy, mighty angels reaching to heaven. I suppose they reach from here to the very gate, and when an audience is assembled for Christian worship, the air is full of them. If each one of you have a guardian angel, how many celestial there are here. They crowd the place they hover, they flit about, they rejoice. Look, that spirit is just come from the throne. A moment ago it stood before Christ, and heard the doxology of the glorified. Look! Bright immortal, what news from the gold-erity! Speak, spirit blest! The response comes melting on the air: "Come, for all things are now ready!" Angels ready to bring the tidings, angels ready to drop the benediction, angels ready to kindle the joy. They have stood in glory—they know all about it. They have felt the joy that is felt where there are no tears and no graves: immortal health, but no invalidism; songs, but no groans; wedding bells, but no funeral tches—eyes that never weep—hands that never blister—heads that never faint—hearts that never break—friendships that are never weakened.

Ready, all of them! Ready thrones, principalities and powers! ready seraphim and cherubim! Ready, Michael the archangel! Again, your kindred in glory are all ready for your coming. I pronounce modern spiritualism a fraud and a sham. If John Milton and George Whitefield have no bet- business than to crawl under a table and hide the leaves, they had better stay at home in glory. While I believe that modern spiritualism is bad, because of its mental and domestic ravages, common sense, enlightened by the Word of God, teaches us that our friends in glory sympathize with our redemption. This Bible says plainly there is joy in heaven among the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth; and if angels rejoice and know of it, shall not our ends, standing among them, know it? Some of these spirits glory toiled for our redemption. When they came to see, their chief grief was that you were not a Christian. They said: "Meet me in heaven!" and put their hand out from the cover and said: "Good-bye." Now, suppose you should cross over from a sinful life to a holy life. Suppose you should be born into the kingdom. Suppose you should now say: "Farewell, Oh, deceitful world! Get thee gone my sin! Fie upon all the follies! Oh, Christ, help me or I perish! I take thy promise, believe thy Word, enter thy service." Suppose you should say and do this? Why, the angel sent to you would shout upward: "He is coming!" and the angel, poising higher in the air, would shout it upward: "He is coming;" and it would roll all up the line of light, from wing to wing, and from trumpet to trumpet, until it reached the gate; and then it would flash to "the house of many mansions," and it would find out your kindred there, and before your tears of repentance had been wiped from the cheek, and before you had finished your first prayer, your kindred in glory, would know of it, and another heaven would be added to their joy, and they would cry: "My prayers are answered; another loved one saved. Give me a harp with which to strike the joy. Saved! saved! saved!"

If I have shown you that "all things are ready," that Christ is ready, that the Holy Spirit is ready, that the Church is ready, that the angels in glory are ready, that your glorified kindred are ready, then with all the concentrated emphasis of my soul, I ask you if you are ready? You see my subject throws the whole responsibility upon yourself. If you do not get in to the King's banquet, it is because you do not accept the invitation. You have the most important invitation. Two arms stretched down from the cross, soaked in blood from elbow to finger-tip; two lips quivering in mortal anguish; two eyes beaming with infinite love, saying: "Come, come, for all things are now ready."

I told you that when the Queen came to Kenilworth Castle, they stopped all the clocks, that the finger of time might be pointed to that happy moment of her arrival. Oh! if the King would come to the castle of your soul, you might well afford to stop all the clocks, that the hands might forever point to this moment as the one most bright, most blessed, most tremendous. Now, I wish I could go around from circle to circle and invite every one of you, according to the invitation of my text, saying: "Come!" I would like to take every one of you by the hand, and say: "Come!" Old man, who has been wandering seventy or eighty years, thy sun almost gone down, through the dust of the evening stretch out your withered hand to Christ. He will not cast thee off, old man. Oh! that one tear of repentance might trickle down thy wrinkled cheek. After Christ has fed thee all thy life long, do you not think you can afford to speak one word in his praise?

Come, those of you who are farthest away from God. Drunkard! Christ can put out the fire of thy thirst. He can break that shackle. He can restore thy blasted home. Go to Jesus. Libertine! Christ saw thee where thou wert last night. He knows of thy sin. Yet, if thou wilt bring thy polluted soul to him this moment, he will throw

Some of the cases of suffering disclosed by our District Visitors are extremely touching. Going into the very heart of the great tenements, some of which have as many as twenty-four families in a single building, these visitors search out hidden cases of destitution—cases that would not reach the public eye otherwise. Indeed, there are many who would rather die than make a public appeal, which might be construed as begging. Among the fathers and grown-up sons and daughters, one hears everywhere the same cry: "Give us work, or we shall starve!" In one case the husband, wife and two oldest children in a family of eight had all been engaged on ready-made clothing. The four together, when times were prosperous, earned less than $13 a week; but work ceased many weeks ago. Some people who are totally unacquainted with the exigencies of life in a great city may remark that these people should have saved meanwhile; but it is hard to understand how they could do more than live under such circumstances. Rent was $8 a month, and the wife and younger children needed strengthening food. The baby was but a few months old. The prices received for their labor were such as would appall most people, namely: seventy-five cents per dozen for wrappers, forty cents per dozen for children's underwear, eight cents per pair for finishing trousers, which meant facing, putting in pockets, sewing on buttons and been earning a dollar a week, and on this they have lived.

Among the many other cases relieved were a husband, wife and child, (no work in six months and all credit gone at the grocer's; a book-keeper three months idle, and with a sick wife and two little ones, all three starving together in a rear room on the top of a tenement; a widower with a thirteen-months' old child, both destitute; and many others, some with large families all more or less ragged and emaciated from long deprivation of food. In one home the Visitor found a machinist, who had been four months idle and whose wife lay in bed sick, with a baby only a few days old, while a bright little 5-year-old prattled and played on the bare floor. They had become desperate, and were about to be dispossessed by their landlord when the relief came, which saved their little home and replenished their table. These are typical cases. It would be impossible to describe the pitiful condition of some of the homes visited, where want had produced sickness, and where the bread, potatoes, milk, tea and coal furnished by the "Food Fund" were accepted with tears of joy and broken words of gratitude.

In many of the homes visited, the children were found almost naked, and their mothers in little better condition. To these the gifts of clothing sent by some of the contributors to the "Food Fund" were specially welcome. One box, forwarded by Miss Belle Waidman of Junction, N. J.,—the contribution of that lady's Sunday School class, was distributed among nearly a dozen poor families, who had not owned a decent-looking garment in many months. Mother looked proudly on their little tots in their comfortable garments and, with faltering lips, blessed the kind-hearted people who had given them so much pleasure.

The first week of the "Food Fund" has accomplished much, but it has only afforded a glimpse of what remains to be done. Every help in the work will be welcomed and even the smallest aid will be the means of bringing happiness to some afflicted family. All contributions of money and clothing should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOOD FUND, Bible House, New York.

over it the mantle of his pardon and love. Mercy for thee, O! thou chief of sinners. Harlot! thy feet foul with hell, and thy laughter the horror of the street—oh, Mary Magdalen—look to Jesus. Mercy for thee, poor lost waif of the street! Self-righteous man, thou must be born again, or thou canst not see the kingdom of God. Do you think you can get into the feast with those rags? Why, the King's servant would tear them off and leave you naked at the gate. You must be born again. The day is far spent. The cliffs begin to slide their long shadows across the plain. Do you know the feast has already begun—the feast to which you were invited—and the King sits with his guests, and the servant stands with his hand on the door of the banqueting-room, and he begins to swing it shut. It is half-way shut. It is three-fourths shut. It is only just a-jar. Soon it will be shut.

"Come, for all things are now ready." Have I missed one man? Who has not felt himself called this hour? Then I call him now. This is the hour of thy redemption.

While God invites, how blest the day,
How sweet the Gospel's charming sound!
Come sinner, haste, oh, haste away,
While yet a pardoning God is found.

even making the button-holes besides.

One lady District Visitor having charge of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund in a populous section of the Westside, in one day visited sixty families and found a very large number in want of immediate relief.

One woman living in a basement on West 21st Street she found with a blind and sick husband and two children, one a boy who gets work irregularly at silk dyeing. He is the sole support of the little home. The mother does what little work she can to help. All bear the marks of privation on their faces. In another house, on the next street, is a man with a wife and one child. He is an expert cabinet-maker, but has been out of work for nearly six months. The condition of this home can be better imagined than described. In a third house, she found that the death angel had preceded her and that the husband had been taken. The Merritt Mission defrayed the cost of the funeral. This poor father literally died of a broken heart, through not being able to get work. He left a widow and five children to the care of the world and the Food Fund is supplying their wants temporarily. In another home, the father, who is an expert gardener, has been out of work six months. He has excellent references but can get no employment anywhere. His wife and child and his mother are dependent on him. His sister, a kind, willing girl, has

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 11, Gen. 17:1-9. Golden Text, Gen. 15:6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ABEL, Enoch, and Noah, were all men of faith, but Abraham was not only himself a man of faith, but also a father: "the father of all them that believe." In Noah, the generation of his day came under judgment and the curse; in Abraham and his seed, should all nations of the earth be blest. Abraham was essentially a father. Abraham and his seed are often so mentioned together; God is the God of Abraham, but not Abraham alone; also of Isaac and of Jacob. God's first promise to Abraham was: "Be thou a blessing . . . In thee shall all the families of the earth be blest." God could take Enoch and Noah into his confidence regarding present and future judgment; both these holy men were prophets, but Abraham was a father, truly a kingly and a priestly man in his own tents, but even more a father, a man of the family, a head of the race of Israel, a head of the race of men of faith.

God had made a covenant with Noah; but it included, not only Noah's seed, but also every living creature. Noah's covenant was, exclusively one of giving on God's side and receiving on man's side, and on the side of the animate creation. But God's covenant with Abraham was of another order. God had specially prepared Abraham; when he called him to come out from his country, his kindred and his father's house, it was the call to him to make of God before all that was dear to him. Noah knew that if he had taken part with the judged world, he would have perished in the general destruction. No such calamity threatened Abraham had he remained in his country and in his father's house. If he had remained there he might, like the rich man, have received in his lifetime his good things (Luke 26:25), but he deliberately chose God at any cost, at any risk, and made no conditions whatsoever; he "came out not knowing whither he went." There was no intrinsic perfection in Abram; equally with Elijah, he was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he made a terrible mistake when he denied his wife in Egypt and in Gerar (Gen. 12:11-20; 20:2-18), and again in his taking Hagar at his wife's suggestion, but the bent of his life was to consider God before himself, and before all else. God had found in Abraham a heart which responded to his own, something which answered to him. Therefore, this father of them that believe must pass through a severe school in the tests to which his faith should be put, in order that he might become a spiritual progenitor of a spiritual seed, and through his history, incorporated in the living, powerful Word of God, beget a race of men of faith. Thus we can understand how, after his acting on human lines, and yielding to the human pressure of Sarah his wife in taking Hagar to help God to fulfil his promise, thirteen years of silence must take place between him and his God, during which there is no mention of his building an altar, or of God speaking to him. But God knew when this dignified token of his displeasure was enough, and, in his wondrous grace, he was the first to break the silence. It was when Abram was ninety years old and nine that God appeared to him, and said unto him: "I am the Almighty God: walk before Me, and be thou perfect, and I will make My covenant between Me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly." It was a reproof: why should Abraham have tried to help the Almighty? But it was also

A Guarantee of Power

for Abraham to fulfil his side of the covenant. In God's covenant with Noah, man had no more part than the animal creation, he was a simple recipient of blessing. With Abram it was otherwise. By the very fact of God's Almightyness, revealed to him, God appealed to him to walk before him and be perfect. Enoch and Noah had walked with God, Noah was to walk before him as, later on, Elijah stood before the Lord God of Israel (1 Kings 18:1). Abram was to prove God's Almightyness in respect to his vocation of father, in which, first by denying his wife, and afterward by taking Hagar, he had sinned just in failing to count on God's Almightyness. Oh, how wonderful it is that God does his mighty works just exactly in the place of man's failure! How we see that our weakness and failure—seen by God long before it is clear to us—is no hindrance to him! He only wants to have the ruin in his own hands, and then he can recreate. How could the fallible Abram walk before God after he had so signally failed? Just by the very knowledge of his fallibility which would make him count on God's Almightyness. While he was loyal to God, and walked before him in full sight of his Almightyness, in a perfect way. Abram had learned something in those years of silence; he knew now how to be ashamed; he "fell on his face." God can talk with a man who lies upon his face ashamed before the Holy One; Abram was riper for God's purpose now that he lay upon his face than he was when the first glow of enthusiasm lit up his face as he turned his back upon the land and friends of his childhood and youth; something of self-satisfaction might have filled his heart then, but shame and confusion of face now. God talked with him, saying: "As for Me, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations." What then? was the silence of God no token of a change of purpose? No; the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." (Rom. 11:29.) God may wait until his children are in a condition to receive his promise and to carry out his purpose; but his purpose itself cannot be shaken. What then? Should Abraham still be a father? Yes; and of many nations. And God changed his name as a token that he would fulfil his promise and then he called out Abraham's faith to a much stronger test and said: "For a father of many nations have I made thee." Only God has a right to speak of the future as though it were already. "And Abram believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." And his faith at this point prepared him for the crowning test of his life when he was called to offer up his only son, Isaac, in whom his seed was called.

God would Keep him

And I will make thee exceedingly fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. Yes, and not only earthly kings but they who shall reign with Christ are spiritually the children of Abraham. "And I will establish My covenant with thee, and with thy seed after thee, throughout their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee." It was worth the stern rebuke of God's silence through all those thirteen years of Ishmael's life, to know now that not only himself but his seed were the chosen of God to whom he bound himself, and pledged himself to be their God. "And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee,

The Land of thy Sojournings"

(R.V.); all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession." Every true son and daughter of Abraham comes into eternal possession of the land of their sojournings. God is always uprooting his children from places, and habits, and positions, where they settle down here on earth. He is ever reminding us that we are pilgrims. But with every striking of our tent, every break up of family ties, or of the links in Christian work, which we accept joyfully from the hands of God something eternal has taken place. The root torn up from earth is securely planted in heaven; the pilgrim spirit develops the citizen of heaven, and God's purpose to disunite man from earth and from himself and to unite him to himself is being invisibly, but surely, carried out. God would never have said to Noah what he said to Abraham: "As for thee thou shalt keep My covenant." He had drawn nearer to Abraham and he ordained that every male of Abraham's seed should bear a mark in his flesh which should mean: "God is in covenant with me and I with him." It was as a circumcised man that Abraham was to become father of nations, of kings, of the promised Seed, and of all them that believe. Circumcision was to be the token of the covenant "made" by God, but to be "kept" by man." God was bringing out his purposes and preparing Abraham for everlasting companionship with him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

ABOUT twenty-four years elapsed between the events of the last lesson and those which we consider this week. During that time, Abram had visited Egypt, being driven out of Canaan by famine. After a painful and humiliating experience, he had returned. Lot was still with him, but on their return, the wealth of the uncle and nephew gave rise to troubles. Their servants quarrelled, probably about pasturage and the use of wells; and Abram, foreseeing the possibility of these quarrels leading to a personal estrangement between himself and Lot, proposed that they should separate, while the quarrels were still confined to their servants. With princely generosity, he gave his nephew the choice of country; and Lot, unable to respond in the same spirit, chose the richer district. It appears to have been about five years after the separation, that Abram heard that Lot and all his property had been captured and carried captive in a war between the kings of the district Lot had chosen for his residence; and Abram promptly gathered his retainers and rescued his nephew. After this he received the assurance that he should have a son, from whom should descend a great nation. Sixteen years passed and there were no signs of the promise being fulfilled. Abram was ninety-nine years old and he was possibly beginning to question in his mind whether he had not been mistaken as to the promise of posterity. To relieve his mind and to strengthen his faith, the promise is repeated in the vision at Hebron, which is the subject of the lesson. He is to continue his righteous life and is assured that there has been no mistake on his part as to the promise. In spite of appearances he will be the father of many nations—a promise fulfilled afterward in the descendants of Isaac and Ishmael—the land of Canaan would be the possession of his posterity and God would be their God as he was the God of Abraham. This new name he was in future to bear, the addition of the two letters changing its signification from "high or exalted father" to that of the "exalted father of a multitude." The chief lesson to dwell upon is that God expects us to believe him and trust him in the face of what seem to us insurmountable difficulties. We are still to believe his promise, even when it seems to us that it is impossible it can be fulfilled. So highly does God value such faith in him that he counts it as righteousness. The wicked man who turns from his wickedness and trusts in God's promise is forgiven and God treats him as if he were righteous. Thus early in the world's history is the New Testament doctrine of justification by faith introduced. Very dear to God is the man who implicitly believes and trusts him.

Walk before me and be thou perfect. He who lives in the consciousness that he is always in the presence of God and desirous to please him will do nothing mean or selfish. Among the candidates for church membership in a certain church was a girl who was employed as a housemaid. She had some difficulty in satisfying the deacon who talked with her that she had experienced the great change. Her knowledge of doctrine was small and she knew little of the evidences. "Tell us," said the minister kindly, "of anything that makes you think you are born again." The girl hesitated a moment and then said, "It may seem trifling thing to you, sir, but one thing that I sweep under the mats, now."

A father of many nations. That promise has been exactly fulfilled. All Christendom rejoices in the spiritual light which has dawned upon the earth when Abraham separated himself from idolaters and went out to live alone for God. From his descendants, Moses, David, the Prophets, and greatest of all, Christ himself, who was of the seed of Abraham, has come the light and guidance by which the nations walk to this day. Travelers in South America tell us of species of palm, called the Tamai Caps which has the power in a remarkable degree of attracting the atmospheric moisture, which it condenses and drops upon the earth in refreshing dew. In the midst of an arid desert it rises, and around it a luxuriant vegetation soon springs forth. The flood gates of heaven may refuse to open, the flow of the fountains may cease, the rivers may shrink into rivulets, but the life-giving rain-tree is only the more active in winning moisture from the reluctant air, and creating an oasis where the traveler's weary eye shall find delight, and his heated brow a cooling shade. What a type this is of the refreshing dew which have come from the seed of Abraham!

Establish my covenant with you. Of Martin Luther it has been said, that, though generally cheerful and happy in his God there were times when he passed through deep waters, and cried in bitterness of soul "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me." Once, when nothing seemed to avail, he was induced to leave home for a few days, in the hope that he might recover his cheerfulness; but he returned with a cloudy and dejected countenance. Great was his surprise, on entering the house, to find his wife seated in the middle of the room, attired in black garments, and with a mourning cloak thrown over her, while she pressed her handkerchief to her eyes, as if bitterly weeping! He eagerly inquired the cause of her distress, which she seemed loath at first to communicate; but, on his again imploring her to speak, she answered, "Only think, dear doctor, our Father in heaven is dead! Judge if I have not cause for my grief." Upon this, immediately comprehending her riddle, he laughed, and embracing her, said, "You are right, dear Kate; I am acting as if there were no God in heaven;" and from that hour his melancholy left him.

Thy seed after thee. The children of a righteous man are benefited by his righteousness. As the sons of a drunkard or a vicious man inherit in their blood a proclivity to the vices of their father, so the children of the good man are predisposed to follow in their father's steps. As a famous writer has said, "The righteous man makes a provident laying by in a double sense for the future. He is blessed after death and his descendants are blessed, too. We do much as the Arabs, who travelling in the desert, bury water in certain fore-planned places that those of the tribe following may find welcome refreshment."

An everlasting Possession. This was a promise none beside God could make. There is no possession on earth so secure that it is free from the danger of loss. A French peasant who had a dread of being poor in his old age saved his money and hoarded it carefully. He feared to trust it to the Government or to a bank, and kept it hidden under the floor of his room in which he lived and worked. There, he felt convinced, it would be safe, and he counted over the precious notes whenever he added another to the store. There came a time of distress and the man was out of work. He could not save anything to add to his hoard and he would not look at it lest he should be tempted to spend one of the notes. It was six weeks since he had seen it and he bore his poverty as well as he could. Hunger at last overcame his avarice and he reluctantly went to the hiding-place to get money for food. To his horror and dismay he found nothing but a heap of feathery fragments. Two rats had chewed up the whole to make their nest.

Martha of Lebanon.

Syrian Housewife at Home—Domestic Affairs—An Oriental Cuisine—Bread-making—A Dish of Pottage.

HE looks up from her washing as we near her home. Her laundry is roofed by a friendly fig-tree; one side is protected from the wind by a wall of loosely-laid stones, picked up in the adjacent fields. Her lute joins this at a right angle. Upon her right hand is a confused heap of baskets, water-pots, sticks ad straw. A chicken roosts upon the utmost basket and will probably sleep in tonight. A shapeless garment that may be Martha's own "izzar," or her husband's trousers, is spread upon the heap dry.

The entire furniture of the laundry is in all sight, when we have added to it her sit tub. "I need not remind American housewives of the insistence of Irish help upon this 'convenience' of every well-ordered household. Martha's tub is a great metal bowl, and it is set between her knees, her feet being the earth from which she—and we—sprang. One daughter sits with folded hands beside her; another is lazily stirring lentil pottage in the pot used awhile ago for heating the water required for her mother's morning task. For Martha, be it understood, is as sensible of the desirableness of having both 'hot and cold water' when she is about her washing, as Bridget-of-the-hog. She makes a little go very far, however, and the fire of sticks over which it was heated having burned itself out into a bed of clear coals, she utilizes it and the kettle in the preparation of the family supper.

The family wash is not large. When she has rubbed, rinsed, and wrung a couple of white izzars for herself, a cotton tunic or skirt for her lord, and two or three sheets for the baby, the bulk of the work is disposed of. Those who groan over the heavy wash of a Monday in our more (or less) favored land, can form an idea of the diminution of toil that would be brought about by the absence from the weekly tale of articles, of towels, table-cloths, sheets, napkins, stockings, handkerchiefs and underclothing of all kinds. Martha wears either shoes nor stockings, nor does any member of her flock. Each is habited in at least one garment, for she is a decent body, and scorns the shiftless neighbors who suffer their boys to run abroad with no covering on their supple bodies. When the solitary frock or tunic, or "combination suit" of blouse and trousers drops quite to pieces, a new one is substituted, and the remnants of the former are worked up in some manner. By the time that the washing is spread upon the stones and underbrush to dry, it is time the bread, set to rise this morning in a red earthen pan, should be kneaded. The kitchen is on the other side of the house. Martha has ideas of the fitness of things, and does not "clutter" as the manner of some is. She has all of out-of-doors to work in and uses what she needs. A cloth is laid under the low table which is sprinkled thickly with flour before the risen dough is cast upon it. What falls from the board during the kneading will thus be saved. With rapid touches she brings the yielding lump into a ball, and tosses it from one hand to the other with incredible swiftness. It grows in size and lightness before your eyes, and when she adjudges it to be light and large enough, is turned to the board and patted into a sheet hardly thicker than stout writing-paper. A round, slightly convex piece of iron, not unlike a shield in form and size, has been heating over coals glowing within a sort of semi-circular fender of red clay. The bread-sheet is laid upon the shield and cooks quickly. As each relay is browned, it is transferred to a wicker tray to cool, and another takes its place. These cakes have a top and bottom crust with a void space between them. They are usually sour. Indeed, most of the bread I have eaten, or tried to eat, in Syria is sour, and my soul loathes it. Martha's cakes are likewise tough, shortening being an unknown quantity in the manufacture.

The family, as a rule, meet at but one meal in the day, and that is supper. Unless it rains, they will partake of this under the fig-tree, and chickens and dogs be in readiness to devour such scraps as may be flung to them. Less careful providers do not get up a hot supper every day of the week, contenting themselves with preparing a great pot of stew of some description on alternate days, and eating what is left over on the morrow. Martha looks well to the ways of her household. Her husband earns a matter of thirty-two cents a day—which goes as far as a dollar-and-a-quarter would in the United States—and deserves a comfortable, orderly meal when he comes home in the evening. Tonight, it will be "that same red pottage," we have seen the daughter stirring in the pot. We would call the lentils composing it brown; Martha knows them as red, and the dish she evolves from them is, we believe, identical with that bought by hungry Esau from his smart brother. The dried lentils are soaked, then boiled and drained, and left to cool and stiffen for awhile. Half-an-hour or so before supper, they will be thrown into boiling oil or fat of some kind, and heated thoroughly, then seasoned and poured into a large crockery or wooden bowl. If she would have it especially savory, she fries an onion in the fat before putting in the lentils.

"You will observe," says our interpreter, "that this is not porridge, nor yet what the French cooks set before us as a 'potage,' or a 'puree.' It is a dish of pottage." It gives forth a goodly smell as it reeks in kettle and bowl. I have eaten it with hearty relish more than once in hotel and private house, and never without a sorrowful thought of the hungry hunter who made an unlucky meal of "bread and pottage of lentils."

He doubtless ate it as Martha's spouse will eat of this, from a bowl set flat upon the earth. The family gather about it, cross-legged, or as our traveler puts it—"sitting upon nothing, as only Orientals can sit." Each tears off a bit of leathery crust from a round cake of bread, dips it deftly into the pottage, securing enough to envelope in the folded scrap of crust, which is thus conveyed to the mouth. As a fresh bit of bread is used each time the "sop" is dipped, the method is not unclean—provided always that the eater's fingers are clean. In view of the scarcity of water in the land, and the absence of towels, not to mention the various uses to which bowls are put, we do not inquire wisely when we give this point too much consideration.

To-morrow, Martha may serve a stew of potatoes, flavored with onions and unctuous with grease. After the custom of the peasantry of all countries, the lower classes of Northern and Southern Syria are inordinately fond of fat and sweets. Potatoes, although introduced into Syria by missionaries, less than a century ago, have taken kindly to the soil and are a favorite dish. Or, she may pull up a cabbage from the plot of garden behind her hut, or buy it from a neighbor. Chopped cabbage, rice and onions, shining with fat, are not to be despised. There is also what we classify as a species of vegetable marron, but shaped more like a cucumber, that, when shred into the pot, reminds us of the great vessel Elisha ordered his servant to "set on and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets."

"And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine, and gathered thereof wild gourds, his lapfull and shred them into the pot of pottage; for they knew them not."

Rice is cooked far better by Martha than by a majority of professional cooks with us. Every grain stands up for itself, and is further encouraged to independence by a crating of olive oil or some kind of gravy. Seasoned with onion, and made more pleasing to the eye by bits of minced tomato, it is palatable and nourishing.

The hostess stands aside, and bows, raising her hand to her forehead, then laying it upon her heart, inviting us to pass into her dwelling before her. The outer walls of heavy stones are laid in sun-dried clay, with which the inner walls are coated. The flat roof is supported by rough boards laid from side to side. Upon these is a layer of sticks and straw, and over these earth is spread to the depth of eight or ten inches, and beaten or rolled flat. As the winter rains come on, the covering of the house must be frequently—sometimes daily—inspected. A crack soon widens into a fissure. "By slothfulness the roof sinketh in, and through idleness of the hands, the home leaketh."

The continual dropping in a rainy day is of muddy water, and the household is fortunate if the whole superstructure of mud, twigs and boards does not give way and overwhelm them, or drive them into the windy storm and tempest.

Our Martha is notable in her generation, and evidently expects us to admire the proofs of the quality offered by the interior of her abode. To appreciate her ingenuity, I must remark that the flooring of clay mixed with chopped straw or stubble is kneaded and spread by the women themselves, and that they keep the inner walls in repair by daubing them with the same mixture. When the floor is badly broken, or very foul from use, the housewife cleans house by kneading a fresh supply of this untempered mortar and besmearing it anew. Martha has invented a process of combining her mortar with gum gathered laboriously from mountain-trees, which imparts a gloss to walls and floor. She has likewise smoothed the cement with a board instead of contenting herself with patting it level with hands and feet. The only attempt at decoration we have seen in the houses of the Eastern peasants is pathetically prominent in the ten-by-ten room in which we now stand. It is Martha's master-piece and must be duly admired if one desires to secure a reputation for taste in the fine arts. Right in the middle of the room (which is the house) is a rude pillar, about as thick and high as a five o'clock tea-table, constructed of red clay hardened by gum, and really resembling red stone.

Besides the door, there are two small windows upon opposite sides of the apartment. The dead-wall facing us as we enter is the family store-room. The place of honor is given to the barrel of family flour (meal.) Upon the top is the kneading-trough, or pan, in which the dough is mixed and set to rise. A hole near the bottom of the barrel lets out the meal when it is needed for use, and is then plugged up with a rag. The sight corrects our preconceived ideas of the widow of Sarepta's mode of getting the day's supply from her exhaustless barrel. We who have pictured her as leaning far over the edge, scraping up the flour from the echoing bottom, have lost the beauty and the significance of the miracle. The daily dole came from above, as will be seen, and she had no means of estimating how much or how little was left in the barrel, as she drove the plug back into place.

The cruse of oil, by a pleasant coincidence, not of our contrivance, is nearby on the floor, full-bodied and narrow-necked. If faithless, the widow might peer, but unsuccessfully, to guess how long she might depend upon the contents remaining in the bottom.

I cannot leave the widow of Sarepta without relating a little incident that came to me the other day. A party of traders and missionaries visiting Sarepta from Sidon on Thanksgiving day, saw just without what was once the gate of the city, "a woman gathering of sticks" to make a fire.

The commonest events of the lowly life in this country, so strange and yet so familiar to the Bible-student, is an expressive commentary upon the Scriptures. As when, before coming indoors, Martha, perceiving that the fire of coals under the lentil-pot was nearly out, hastily rolled a bunch of dried grass into a wisp, thrust it under the kettle and as it smoked, persuasively blew it into a flame.

"If God so clothe the grass of the fields, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven."

"Smoking flax shall he not quench." But to our store-room—Strings of onions and peppers hang from the ceiling; smaller barrels of rice and other commodities are in line with that holding the meal; jars, pots and kettles are upon these; a big pestle is suspended alongside a miscellany of baskets, cloths and porringers, each of which has value in Martha's sight. Her cousin of Bethany would hasten to unroll a mat or rug for us to stand upon. It is not easy or convenient for country Martha to get woven matting, and rugs are a city luxury. We can see for ourselves that the broom of twigs set in house-wifely order, with the brush end uppermost, against the wall has been in diligent use to-day. The floor, if hard, is smooth and clean, and her Bethany kinswoman could not offer, with more cordial, hospitality the cushions now brought forward for our accommodation.

EARLY FORESHADOWINGS.

NATURE invariably hints for what she has made a child. Here is a boy cunning at a bargain. At school he is extravagantly fond of trading. He will not come home twice with the same knife, or hoop, or kite. To-morrow morning he will leave the house with an ignominious yarn-ball—a great trial to a boy on the play-ground—but at night will come back with one of India-rubber, which, under the stroke of the bat, will soar almost out of sight, and then come down with long-continued bounce! bounce! Some morning, calculating the lowness of the apple-market, he will take a satchel full to school. Immediately there is a rush in the market. He monopolizes the business. He sells at just the right time. The vigilant school-master, finding him bartering in what are not considered lawful business hours, brings him into port, and he is compelled by this government officer to discharge his cargo in the presence of his fellows, who gape upon him like a company of stevedores. Can you doubt for a moment for what occupation he was designed? He must be a merchant.

Here is a boy of different liking. Across the brook he has thrown a dam, and whirling around is a water-wheel. He can construct anything he chooses—sleds for the winter, wagons for the summer, and boats for the river. His knife is most of the time out on a whittling excursion. Down on your best carpets he plants his muddy tools. You are so pestered on the Saturdays when there is no school, it requires all of Sunday, and sharp sermons at that, to get your patience uncrinkled. Pigeon-coops on the barn and bird houses in the trees attest his ingenuity. Give him a trade. He must be a mechanic.

Here is another boy. You do not know what to do with him. He is always starting an argument. He meets your reproof with a syllogism. He is always at the most inconvenient time asking, "Why?" He is non the opposite side of what you believe, but anything for an argument. If you promised him a flogging, he would file a caveat to stop proceedings, and, dissatisfied with your decisions, he gets out a "certiorari," carrying matters up to the Supreme Court of his own reason. With all this he has a glib tongue, and when fairly started, it rattles like hail on a tin roof. His destiny is plain: he must be a lawyer.

But it you should happen to have under your charge, as guardian or parent, a child not sharp enough to strike a bargain, or ingenious enough to make a sled, not loquacious enough to start an argument, not inquisitive as to the origin of things, always behind in the school, and slow on the play-ground—there is then only this alternative: If he be fat and chubby, of unconquerable appetite and enormous digestion, and lazy withal, then send him to the city, pull the wires, and make him an alderman. But if he be long and lean, sallow-cheeked, with nerves ever on the twitch, and a digestion that will not go, I know not what you will do with him unless you make him a minister. Alas! for the absurdity rampant among families, that when, because of physical incompetency, a man is fit for nothing else, he is fit to be a "legate of the skies." Religion will never make up for lack of liver and backbone.

THE JOY OF DOING GOOD.

WE have known a young man cross, and sour, and queer, and feeble of body and mean of soul, disgusting every body, under a heavenly touch transformed into a man buoyant and blissful, the earth and the heavens breaking forth into music. "O!" says some one, "I admit that must be a great recreation, doing good, and I would surely employ that mode if I had the means." You have the means. "O," says some one, "my means are extremely limited; you would be surprised how small my means are, and I can't employ that mode of recreation." My brother, have you two hands? "Yes." Have you two feet? "Yes." Do you suppose that during the coming year you could devote ten dollars to charities? "Yes." Will you during the year be able to give twenty-five hundred cheerful looks to the desponding? "Yes." Would you during the coming year have five thousand words of encouragement if you should seek for them? "Yes." Magnificent equipment you have.

To-morrow morning on the way to business you see a case of real destitution, for sometimes there is a call from God in such a case, and you can see right through and know the difference between a sham case and a real case of destitution. You contribute two pennies out of those ten dollars you are going to give during the year, and as the pennies rattle down into the blind man's hat, he hears it and says, "God bless you, thank you, thank you, thank you." You look indifferent. You pass down with cultured indifference for fear some one is looking at you. You look as if you were not elated, but from scalp to heel you feel a thrill. No need of denying it. You feel a great satisfaction in having made that man happy.

Why, the most magnificent recreation on earth, for body, mind, and soul, is doing good. Some of you have tried it. You know it better than I do. There are such men and women in the world, thank God!

The world's heart of sympathy beats very irregularly. Plenty of sympathy when we do not want it, and often, when we are in appalling need of it, no sympathy. There are multitudes of people dying for sympathy. Sympathy in their work. Sympathy in their fatigues. Sympathy in their bereavements, sympathy in their financial losses, sympathy in their physical ailments, sympathy in their spiritual anxieties, sympathy in the time of declining years. Wide, deep, high, everlasting, almighty sympathy. We must have it, and Christ has it. Christ it is that is the cord with which he is going to draw all nations to him.

THE REASON WHY.

LET the whole truth be told. In some cases (not all) the chief obstacles to the union of different branches of the ecclesiastical families, are the secretaries and their friends, who have to seek other spheres of usefulness, who could be spared for other work if once the theological seminaries were united. "Where would we go to?" "What will you do with us?" is practically the cry of those who are financially interested in the continued separation. We reply: "Go to work somewhere else!" If the people think you are dull and will not hear you preach, like it for granted that the Lord sometimes calls men out of the ministry as well as calls others into it. The union of such denominations of Christians as are already practically the same, would save to the Church hundreds of thousands of dollars. The courtship has been going on for some time, and we think the ceremony has already commenced, and there is no need of your standing out there forbidding the banns. On all the organs of Christendom let the "Wedding March" be sounded!

Subscriber, Washington, D. C. Are the premiums for subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD still open?

Yes; you can still secure the International Teachers' Bible or "From Manger to Throne," together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year by forwarding $2 to this office.

L. P. San Marcos, Tex. We are called to vote for or against the liquor traffic. In view of the command, "We are not to do evil that good may come," can I purchase a vote to be cast for Prohibition and remain, as I profess to be, a consistent Christian?

No; neither lying, bribery, dissimulation, fraud nor deception of any kind, is justifiable or in harmony with the Christian life, which is founded on truth and righteousness. If the righteous ever hopes to "shine forth as the sun," (Matt. 13: 43), it can only be by emulating the example of our Saviour and imploring divine help to making our Christian profession and practice agree throughout.

A. McCune, Perry, Mo. Where were the spirits in prison to whom Christ is represented as preaching (1 Peter 3: 18-20)?

The Apostle is speaking of the Antediluvians to whom Christ preached by the Holy Spirit in the days of Noah. The passage simply implies that these men now in prison (or the abode of the lost) had had their opportunity of repentance, inasmuch as Christ had preached to them by his Spirit.

Mrs. Williams, Fayetteville, Ark. If God is without form as we are told, what did he mean by saying (Gen. 1: 26) "Let us make man in our image?"

Not our physical image but in spiritual capacity. The distinction is in reference to animals who were without spiritual responsibility and the higher faculties. He was about to make a creature of a higher order than any then existing on the earth, more Godlike and capable of more exalted life.

Vulcan, Des Moines, Ia. Which is the oldest book in the Old Testament? Who was the author?

The Book of Job is generally believed by eminent Biblical scholars to be the oldest. The subject of the book is supposed to have lived in Arabia, about 2414 B.C., and to have been contemporary with Peleg. The authorship is unknown but internal evidence points to the conclusion that it was produced by some Arabian writer. It was evidently written by son e one wholly outside of the Hebrew nation, as it contains no reference to the Law which would have been the case had the author been a Hebrew. The figures of speech employed and the scenery described belong rather to Arabia or Egypt than to Palestine.

Subscriber, Venango, Neb. Did Jesus ever attend school as an ordinary boy?

Of the first thirty years of his life little is recorded beyond the incident of his visit to Jerusalem with Joseph and Mary, when he was twelve years old. Usually both parents of a Jewish child took an active part in its early education. It was incumbent on the father to teach his offspring the Law and the other Scriptures, which constituted the essentials of Jewish education. Josephus, the historian, states that, at fourteen, he himself had so thorough a knowledge of the Law that the high priests and first men of the town sought his opinion. Christ's earlier years, after he had passed from the first lessons of Joseph and Mary, were doubtless spent in school, with other children of the little Galilean village.

Ellen R., Pittsburgh, Pa. During the present season, I have been much out in society, and must confess I have had a pleasant time. But I do object to such dancing as I have frequently witnessed, and hold it to be unfit for anyone, especially for young girls, to take part in. Some of my friends pool-pool my scruples and tell me that there is authority in the Scriptures for dancing. Was the dancing mentioned in the Bible of this sort? I would be glad to be informed.

The Bible contains no instances of dancing where the two sexes unite in the exercise, either for worship or amusement. Those ancient dances were mainly religious, although they were sometimes practised on the occasion of national festivals or to celebrate great victories. (Psalm 149: 3.) They were usually performed by maidens only, and in the daytime. Those who perverted dancing from its original use to purposes of pleasure, were everywhere condemned.

P. E. Wood, Daney, Wis. I am anxious to win souls for Christ from my fellow-boarders. I have done everything I can think of. Can you tell me of any way?

The methods you describe in your letter as having been adopted are surely the best. You cannot do better than continue praying for them. The persistent urging of religion upon them under the circumstances you mention might do more harm than good. Your own life must be the silent preacher now. Patience, forbearance, kindness, helpfulness and all care to avoid sin yourself will eventually win their respect and good will. You will then have better opportunities for pressing the subject of religion on their attention.

Mr. John Lance, Whittlesby, O. How long a pe was occupied with the work of creation?

It is impossible to say. Evidences are for in the world's crust by geologists of the length of enormous periods, the length of which can only guess at. The days mentioned in Genesis may have been separated by great tervals, or may have represented long periods.

O. W. Lashier, Ariadne, Tenn. 1. Is a Christian bidden to take the oath in a Court of Justice elsewhere by Matt. 5: 34-37? 2. In what condition is a man when Christ's words about the finding the house swept and garnished Matt. 43-45 apply to him?

1. It is generally thought that Christ referred to oaths in ordinary conversation when he forbade his followers to swear. The rever taking of the oath as a jurymen or witness is a very different matter from the blasphemous exclamations with which wicked men gain their remarks. It is to these latter probably that Christ referred. 2. Primarily the Lord applies his remark to the Jewish nation who would worse after the temporary reformation under teaching of John the Baptist. Individually man is in danger of falling into that state w aroused and convicted of sin rests satisfied w a moral reformation instead of giving his le into Christ's keeping.

John W. Loogrove, Staunton, Va. 1. Is the undonable sin one that can be committed only by a believer who has received baptism of the Holy Spirit? If not what does Mark 3: 29 mean? What did Christ mean when he said (Luke 9: 42) "let the dead bury the dead?"

1. There is a mystery about the unpardonable sin which has never been satisfactorily solved. The most credible explanation is that it was: tributing to the devil the power by which the Holy Spirit operated. If this is so a man w had received the baptism of the Holy Spi would be about the last man likely to commit it. 2. A man whom Christ called to follow h ought to allow nothing to interpose between him and that duty. A funeral in that land was particularly likely to unsettle him as it would be ceremony at which he would meet all his family. He being spiritually awakened and called mig leave to those who were spiritually dead t duty of burying the dead man.

As we stated in our issue of Dec. 6, last, t body of Menephtah has been found and it h always been supposed by the majority of Egyptologists that he was the Pharaoh whose am was destroyed in the Red Sea. It is certain th he was the son of Rameses II. whose reign at character correspond in many details to th of the Pharaoh of the oppression. Menephtah as shown by the hieroglyphs, had a son great promise, who reigned with him and d mysteriously when a young man, as would h been the case in the slaying of the first-bo if the theory that Menephtah was the Pharaoh of the Exodus be correct. Menephtah is d scribed as a cowardly monarch, who, on mo than one occasion, had some convenient vision or otherwise found a pretext for avoidi personal danger by staying out of the batti and the supposition is reasonable that, in p uing the Israelites, he halted on the verge of the divided sea, and so saved his own life while his army entered and perished.

ANCIENT ROCK-CUT IDOLS.

GEOLOGIST, who has lately returned from an exploration of the Bamian Valley, which lies between Afghanistan and Turkestan, has brought back photographs of a remarkable scene in the valley, one which is reproduced on this page. He was invited to witness the evolutions of a strong force of cavalry, which the Ameer of Afghanistan had collected to suppress a rebellion of his subjects, the Hazaras. The exercises took place in a rocky defile, having on one side an ancient Persian city. On the other side is a high precipitous cliff running several miles. The cliff is almost perpendicular and in its side are cut three colossal figures separated only by a few yards. The figures are those of a man, a woman, and a child, and are evidently of remote antiquity. They are roughly done, but considering the hardness of the rock and the primitive tools which must have been in use when they were cut, the carving shows considerable skill. The shape and attitude of the figures indicate that they were the work of the Buddhists, who occupied the valley before its conquest by the Mohammedans. Near each idol is a cavern excavated in the solid rock, and evidently intended for worship. They are now used as arsenals for the store of arms and ammunition. The idols are similarly turned to account. They are hollow and the people use them as store-houses for grain. Whether they were originally used for that purpose, as well as for worship, there is no evidence to show; but a god full of good things would be regarded as no bad object of worship. Even at this late day, worship is too often marred by worldly motives, and men come to God's house and profess to serve him because they look to him as the source of prosperity. The question is still asked, as it was thousands of years ago, "What profit shall we have if we pray?" (Job 21: 15.)

Love in a Pest-house

A dispute between the New Jersey towns of Newark and Elizabeth has brought to light a romantic love story. There was an outbreak of small-pox recently in a boarding-house at Newark, and it was alleged that it was caused by the visit to the house of a girl who is employed as a nurse in the pest-hospital of Elizabeth. The nurse had no difficulty in proving that she had never left the hospital since her engagement. She admitted, however, under pressure, that one of the Newark sufferers from small-pox was her lover, and that he had visited her at the hospital. Her admission caused some surprise, as the Elizabeth authorities keep a guard always on duty at the door of the hospital, who allows no one to go in or out, without a written permit. There is another door to the hospital, but it is surrounded by a swamp, and as no one could reach it from the highway without wading for nearly half a mile through mud and water up to the knees, it was not thought necessary to station a guard there. It was by that door that the ardent lover had gained access. He had passed through the swamp and braved the danger of infection in the hospital that he might see the girl he loved and spend an hour in her society. Probably the young man overlooked, as many do, his responsibility to his associates. Although he might think lightly of the risk to himself of the visit to the pest-hospital and count it small compared with the gratification to be gained, he must regret as he sees others suffer through their personal contact with him. No Christian should forget that none of us liveth unto himself. (Rom. 14: 7.)

A Terrible Patient.

The professors in the College of Veterinary Surgeons in New York have had a thrilling experience in trying to cure a lion belonging to a menagerie now in the city. The lion had been in a difficulty with one of the lionesses in the menagerie and had suffered in the encounter. The lioness had seized his leg in her great jaws and tried to chew it off. She had bitten him once before and the wound had healed, but this time it grew worse and the beast was evidently suffering agony from his injury. As he was a young lion and worth a great deal of money, his owners decided to submit his case to the College of Veterinary Surgeons. They were somewhat timid, as he was a powerful beast, weighing over four hundred pounds, and although he could use only three legs, was capable of doing a great deal of mischief. However, the surgeons consented to treat him and he was taken into the operating room. In trying to secure him to the table, he bit in two the rope that had held him and bounded to the floor. For some time they were in danger, but his keeper succeeded in calming him, and finally, after administering morphine, he became comatose and was safely bound. He recovered, however, when the doctors began work with their probes, and getting one paw loose, struck a blow at one of them which would have decapitated him had he not retreated in time. A little later he bit savagely at another and this plant, said Mr. Gibson, were two-lobed, and from the edge of each lobe spike-like processes projected. Very small circular glands, in which there were cells filled with a purple fluid, covered the surface of the lobes. In the centre of the face of each lobe were three sharp-pointed, sensitive filaments, arranged in the shape of a triangle. As soon as the fly touched the filaments the lobes closed in upon it, and began to crush him gradually, until at last he was crushed out of all shape, and his juices taken in by the glands. The nitrogen in the insect juice set the glands in operation, and they formed a stomach, from which were emitted acid secretions, which dissolved what remained of the fly's body. As soon as the fly is digested, the leaves open again in readiness for the next victim. The insect, doubtless, has no means of knowing the dangerous nature of the plant and does not realize it until the fatal leaves close over him. So much cannot be said for men, who, in spite of warning, venture into the snares of Satan, eager to partake of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil and neglect the tree of life whose fruits are for the healing of the nations. (Rev. 22: 2.)

A Prisoner Bargaining with a Judge.

narrowly missed the doctor's arm. After two hours' work the limb was set and bound in splints and bandages, and the beast was taken back to the menagerie. He remained quiet all day, but in the night he tore off the dressing and will have to undergo another operation. The lion of course did not understand, when he resisted the doctors and undid their work, that they were trying to save him from worse pain. The same excuse, however, cannot be made for Christians who repine and rebel under the discipline and chastisement of God. They should know that although for the present it is grievous, it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness. (Heb. 12: 11.)

Murderous Plants.

A vivid description of insect-eating plants was given a few days ago by Mr. William Hamilton Gibson in a lecture before the New York Kindergarten Association. The plant known as the Venus Flytrap, was taken as a type of the species. The leaves of

The prisoner had been convicted of assault. He had fired a pistol several times at the windows of Delmonico's restaurant and scared the customers and waiters. When arrested he declared that he was a victim in the old quarrel between the rich and the poor. His counsel pleaded with the judge that he was drunk when he committed the crime and it would be better to send him to the Reformatory than to prison. The judge, however, refused and then the prisoner put in a plea on his own account. He asked the judge what the maximum sentence was and the judge told him five years. "Well," said the prisoner, "suppose you send me to prison for five years. When I come out, I shall have a worse grievance against society than I have now, and I shall not be likely to reform. If you suspend sentence I will curb my appetite and never drink any more." The judge seemed surprised at the cool audacity of the man and promptly rejected his offer. "I shall certainly not suspend sentence," he said, and it is not necessary to send you up for five years. But I will sentence you to two years in prison. You must be punished for your crime and if you commit other crimes when you come out, you will be punished more severely. You and men like you must learn that you cannot bribe justice with offers to reform." The prisoner had forgotten, as men forget in their dealing with God, that reformation of life cannot atone for past offences. Justice requires that the prescribed penalty shall be enforced and no man would escape at God's bar, if Jesus had not borne the penalty in his own person for the sins of the world. (Heb. 2: 9.)

The Russian Government has Closed the Depot at Kieff in Southwestern Russia, which was opened by the Bible Society some years ago for the sale of Bibles in the Russian language. The Society was not permitted to remove its stock. An appeal is to be made to the Czar against the action of the Governor of the Province.

The Number of Persons Receiving Relief in London at the end of the year was 104,820. Of this number 65,937 were in the almshouses; the remainder were receiving money and food in their lodgings. Beside these, a number variously estimated at one to five thousand were wholly or partially supported by public or private charity.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has already expended $205,000 in the fight with the gypsy moth the germs of which were unwittingly imported some time ago. The legislature is asked to appropriate $165,000 for use this year in the attempt to exterminate the pest. Preachers and Temperance speakers will find this fact useful as an illustration.

Dr. Wilbur C. Chapman's Meetings at Saratoga, N.Y., have been much blessed of God. Rev. H. M. Simpson writing from that town, says that "the results are very great. Seven churches are engaged in the work" and there is a general movement of spiritual interest throughout the neighborhood. Wednesday, Jan. 17, was observed as a mid-week Sabbath through the town.

Major George H. Hilton's Meetings at Pittsburg, Pa., have resulted in the decision of more than three hundred persons to declare for Christ. The Pittsburg Press says that "never before in its history have such scenes awakened the interest and enthusiasm as these have done." The South Side Presbyterian Church has been crowded nightly and on Sundays it was necessary to hold overflow meetings.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Expect to Commence their campaign in Washington, D.C., on Feb. 7. The chorus choir of fifteen hundred voices is well organized and is being thoroughly drilled. Many prominent statesmen and officials connected with the Government are taking a warm interest in the work. Among these, Vice-President Stevenson is conspicuous. In a recent conversation with Mr. Sankey he expressed his earnest hope for the success of the campaign in the city. The meetings will continue through February.

Helpful Discourses for the People.

THE SECRET OF CHRISTIAN GROWTH.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D. Text: Rom. 2: 7, "To them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality—Eternal life."

ONE cannot fail to notice the frequency with which our Lord insists upon our abiding in right conditions and appointed duties, as the means of attaining to the highest rewards of discipleship. It is not enough that we be in him; we must abide in him. It is not enough that we know his truth; we must abide in his truth. The word which is generally translated abide is also frequently rendered continue. So that whichever translation is favored, the thought is the same. The highest attainments and rewards of discipleship depend upon our steadfast abiding, our patient continuance. Let us consider at this time some of the things in which we are to continue. In the first place then I exhort you to

1. Continuance in grace. In the 13th of Acts we find Paul and Barnabas persuading the Jews and Proselytes "to continue in the grace of God." I do not know that the persons thus addressed were actually Christians; but they had come under the influences of the Gospel, and the apostles urge them to continue therein. To begin to be a disciple of Christ is one thing; to be a disciple is quite another thing. Thousands stop with the first condition. Therefore Jesus uses this solemn warning, "No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the kingdom of God." He does not say "no man turning back," or "no man going back," but no man "looking back." The eye is

The Weather-vane of the Soul.

Mark which way this turns and you can know the tendency of the life. If you have made a move toward following Christ, then I beg you do not even look back; for it may be the crisis of your life. That is the point of the Saviour's warning, "Remember Lot's wife." He is speaking of that momentous scene of the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven. It won't do to take even a backward glance then, lest the opportunity be past. It was so in the day of Sodom. "Up, get thee out of this place, for the Lord will destroy this city," was the warning. And Lot's wife when starting to flee, cast a longing look behind her and was turned into a pillar of salt. As an old preacher stated: "In this critical moment Lot's wife looked back and God never gave her an opportunity to look forward." There are times when the Lord bears with our wavering and indecision, forgives our half-heartedness over and over again. But when the crisis of our destiny comes and we falter, then the hardening follows when we are petrified—not into the salt which is good, but into that which has lost its savor and is henceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden. It is to me the most solemn and most sorrowful fact in human destiny that when one's opportunity comes and is allowed to slip by unimproved, it often turns into a condemnation. Very vivid and serious is the exhortation of the apostle to the Hebrews, "Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip." The words mean exactly "Lest at any time we should float past them." Christ by his death and resurrection has taken us out from the law and brought us under grace. The promises of grace are ours if we will embrace them by faith, the rewards of grace are ours if we will seize them by patient continuance in good works; the victories of grace are ours if we will overcome by prayer and spiritual warfare. And here we are, borne on the stream of time, like a swimmer in the current of Niagara. There is the opportunity of grace, like an overhanging bush or twig. Look out that at the critical moment when you should have lain hold of it, you fail, and float past it into death and doom. There is such a thing as falling from grace, for the apostle himself uses the expression in his letter to the Galatians. I do not say that those who have been born again can ever be unborn, and from the position of sons of God, fall into a condition of hopeless orphanage. But from the doctrines of grace we may fall, into that cold and self-confident morality that has no need of Christ; from the opportunity of grace we may slip away so that we shall get beyond hope. "Christ is become of none effect unto you whosoever of you is justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace." So writes Paul. And have we not seen this text exemplified in our own experience? One who has seemed to take hold of Christ, letting go, and returning again to his own morality as the ground of acceptance. One who has been convicted by the spirit and made sincerely sorry for his sins, returning to his sins and reliving the life which he had been moved to forsake—this is to fall from grace and to turn away from Christ to self. I exhort you therefore who hear me that you will persevere in the grace of God. Stand fast in the decision for Christ which you have once made; retract not the confession of Christ which has gone forth out of your mouth; turn not from the service of Christ upon which you have once entered; be a disciple as well as begin to be a disciple, and you may be prepared for my next exhortation.

II. Continuance in Knowledge. "If ye continue in my Word, then are ye my disciples indeed." (John 8: 31.) To be a believer is one thing, to be a disciple is quite another thing, and the difference between the two may be the difference between the babe in its mother's arms, and the graduate of the university with the highest honors on his head. A single glance at Christ can save the soul: it takes a lifelong gaze at Christ to satisfy the soul.

Our Lord was speaking to those who had already believed, when he used this language. To believe is to be born of God, but there are many in the Church; old in years, but infantile in spiritual stature. And, I doubt not, that God grieves over dwarfs in his family, even worse than we should if we had such a misfortune in our family. And what is the remedy? He replies: "You have believed the Gospel and so been begotten again by 'the incorruptible Seed of the Word,' continue to feed upon this Gospel so that you may be disciples or students of mine. Feeding upon Holy Scripture, that ye may grow up in all things into him who is the Head." This is God's method of spiritual development. But as for man, he has sought out many inventions. Thousands of Christians depend for their religion on the reciting of the creeds and resting in the confessions of the Church. And what are confessions? The Bible is the sincere milk of the Word, and confessions are condensed milk of the Word: the Gospels are the fruit of the tree of life; and creeds are the canned fruit. And what is the objection to making these creeds and confessions the staple of our religion? The objection is that God does not want us to live on canned fruit. It is not so healthful and nourishing as that which is gathered daily. In the Bible we have the tree of life, "which bears twelve manner of fruits and yields her fruit every month." Think of that; what variety and freshness, twelve kinds and twelve crops in a year. There is not a question but if you will pick your basket full every day and eat, you will find the Scriptures always sweet and refreshing; that you will not have to complain of the lack of relish in reading the Word of God?

It is here, as with other books. What student would make any real progress in knowledge who should flit from page to page in his studies: picking here a sentence and there a sentence, here a line, and there a line? Diligent pursuit and patient continuance are absolutely essential to any real growth in knowledge. "If ye abide in my Word then are ye my disciples indeed"—living in it, growing from it—"Ye shall be my disciples"—mastering my secrets, knowing my will, re-living my life and manifesting forth my glory. Be not content, my brother, to be a sinner saved merely; claim and appropriate your privilege of being a disciple sanctified.

III. Continuance in love. "As the Father hath loved me so have I loved you; continue ye in my love." (John 15: 9.) Nothing is here said about continuing in our own love. Now that God has opened his heart to us and given us access to all its fulness he does not set us to pumping affection out of the empty well of our own heart. Here is the mistake of Christians, that they reckon their standing by the warmth and fervor of their own love, instead of resting in the love of God. Christ had one disciple, Simon Peter, who tried three times to tell Jesus that he loved him, and only barely succeeded in doing so. He had another disciple—John—who five times calls himself "the disciple whom Jesus loved," and found no difficulty in doing so. It is an easy thing to bask in the sunshine, but it is quite another thing and God does not require the impossible. Under the law we hear him saying: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." He waited for centuries without finding a solitary one who had kept this commandment. Then he spoke to the world in grace. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." As though he had said: "Since you cannot love me with all the heart, I will now love you with all my heart." As the contrast between the old covenant and the new, is that the one demands doing and the other believing, so here. The decalogue of Sinai says: "Thou shalt love;" the decalogue of Calvary says: "Thou shalt be loved." "We have known and believed the love that God hath for us," says John. Oh! wretched man is he who feels the claims of divine love, but has nothing but his own sinful and selfish heart with which to meet them. Nowhere is "the weakness and unprofitableness" of the commandments more strongly revealed than here. To do, with only the lame hands of helpless human nature with which to work were bad enough, but to love with only the fountain of a cold and loveless heart to draw from, were even worse. And God pitying our helplessness, has ceased from this demand; and in Christ Jesus he has given his own love to be the fount and source of ours. There is an old proverb, "Love is the mother of love." I know not that the proverb ever really found its interpretation till Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. The "Thou shalt" and "Thou shalt not," starting from the cold stones of Sinai never won the affection of a single human heart so far as I know. For affection cannot be commanded: love cannot be legislated. But when on Golgotha in the fleshly tables of our Redeemer's heart, the new decalogue was written: "God commendeth his love towards us in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us;" another method was henceforth adopted for Winning Men.

To Manufacture Sunshine,

The new covenant reads: "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins." This is the law by which human hearts are now to be won for Christ. What an exposition of this law there is in that story of the missionary David Cargill's conquest fifty years ago on the Fiji Islands. When savage cannibals with clubs and knives and spears, advanced to meet him, he spoke with the only two or three words of their language which he had mastered: "My love to you! My love to you!" With this talismanic sentence, he won their attention, disarmed them of their weapons, and in half a century Fiji has become Christianized. Dr. McAlil met the embittered and church-hating Communists of Paris with the only two phrases of French he had mastered. "I love you," "God loves you." And behold what twenty-five years of such preaching wrought! Here is our refuge as believers, here is our weapon as warriors. "But ye, beloved," says Jude, "keep yourselves." Ah! apostle, we cannot keep ourselves; that trinity of foes "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life," is too strong for us! Yes; but hear the whole injunction, "Praying in the Holy Ghost, keep yourselves in the love of God." I cannot keep in my love to God. Alas! for my unfilial heart! I cannot keep God's love in me. But I can keep myself in the love of God. I can rest there. I can rejoice there. I can trust there. Lord Jesus weary and dissatisfied as we are with our own love, we will continue in thy love.

IV. Continuance in prayer. "Continue in prayer and watch in the same with thanksgiving." (Col. 4: 4.) Here is the open secret of spiritual growth and victory. For prayer in its deepest sense is communion—the having in common with God. His strength for our weakness; his life for our death; his love for our selfishness. Therefore the real success of prayer depends upon its unbroken continuance. I think the greatest trouble which beginners in the school of prayer have, is in the fact that the person to whom they speak is unseen, and the power which they invoke is invisible. Oh that I could see him and hear his voice! How easy then it would be for me to make intercession with the Lord. But because we have neither seen his shape nor heard his voice we fall into doubt about the reality of this exercise.

Now I believe that in the triumphs of modern science God has taken pains to give us great object-lessons on this point. Look out upon the avenue yonder at what is constantly occurring. Just above the street there is a current of what we call electricity. Nobody knows what it is, or whence it comes. But there is a car on the track that waits to be moved. It lifts up a long arm and with its finger-tip it touches the trolley-wire, and lo! the car starts off as though the strength of some mighty giant had suddenly seized it. The power which is laid hold of is invisible, but very real. "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Spirit is come upon you," says Jesus. There is the energy that moves the Church! Oh, Christian! Reach up to it! Touch it with the finger of faith! It will move you; it will inspire you; it will lift you! But what is the condition? Unbroken communion! The moment the connection with God is broken, then we begin to feel a slackening of the pace, a weakening of the energy.

A Failure of our Life-Forces.

Amid all the doctrinal defections now apparent in the Church, I contend that the greatest trouble is in the life, not in the creed. Heart-failure is what the Church of God is dying of, not head-failure! And yet there is no need of this weakness; for the heart of the Church is in heaven, and if we only keep our communion with that heart through prayer, we may have the vigor and impulse of the living Christ constantly imparted to us. I believe that it is the breaks in our Christian life, which are the source of our greatest weakness. When it is a question of growth, let us remember that the continuous hold of a child is more effectual than the intermittent grips of a giant. Jesus has wrapped up the whole secret in this principle: "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done for you." Great spasms of prayer, violent storms of intercession at the gates of heaven, followed by long stretches of cold and barren praying, this is not the method by which we are to win great riches of grace and glory. The prayers that remain rooted in one place are the prayers that prevail. This petition for blessing fixed here like a plant in the garden of the Lord, to be looked to and tended daily, is the kind of praying which truly enriches the Christian life. I know not why it is, but it does not seem to be God's way to open the door of heaven at the first knock of intercession. If he were to do so, the privileges of the mercy-seat would become so cheapened that they would bring little spiritual enrichment to the soul. So it is, perhaps, that God perseveres in his silence, that he may train us to persevere in seeking. But "our God shall come and shall not keep silence," if only we show him that we are so desperately in earnest that we cannot take denial. Therefore, let me exhort you, my brethren, to renewed watchfulness at this point. "Backsliding always begins at the closet door;" if the sources of spiritual life are neglected, the stream must certainly dry up. Let us not forget it, that our life is not in our own veins and arteries. Our life is hid with Christ in God. Every answered prayer is a pulse beat of the heart of Jesus. Live then in him constantly; pray in him unceasingly. Thus by patient continuance, shall you attain unto eternal life. This is the goal which is set before us. "He that believeth on the Son hath life" indeed; has it in principle, in germ. For this very reason are we exhorted "to fight the good fight of faith and lay hold of eternal life," that as life is now in us in its beginnings, we may enter into life in its fulness.

THE BAY CITY REVIVAL.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services at Bay City, Mich., are arousing widespread interest through the neighborhood. The Presbyterian Church is not large enough to contain the people and overflow meetings have been held in other churches, even on week-days. On Sunday, January 7, no less than 445 persons made profession of Christ at one service. The Bay City Times-Press says that such scenes as those that take place at the meetings have never been witnessed in that city before.

LINKS TO HEAVEN.

T WAS a beautiful legend, as given of old,
That an angel of mercy placed barriers of gold [birth,
To shorten the pathway of such as at [earth.

Their destiny marked for the sorrows of
And the pure deep fount of the angel's love,
Baptised the babe with the dew from above,
Which gathered in gems of crystalline light,
Like beautiful stars on the curtain of night.

Soon the bright babe slept, and the angel fair,
Placed a crown of gold on its sunny hair,
And the silent boatman carried it o'er
To the bright beyond, on the mystical shore,

Where loved ones were waiting to welcome
it in,
Away from life's cares, and troubles, and sin;

And they led it 'mid scenes of beauty rare—
Sin, sorrow and pain ne'er enter there.

And now, together, they watch and wait,
Close by the side of the beautiful gate,

While the pitying angel still bends in love,
Linking dear hearts to theirs above.
Eureka Springs, Ark. MRS. M. PICKERING.

WHOSE I AM.

JESUS, Master, whose I am,
Purchased thine alone to be,
By thy blood. O spotless lamb,
Shed so willingly for me;
Let my heart be all thine own,
Let me live to thee alone.

Other lords have long held sway;
Now, thy name alone to bear,
Thy dear voice alone obey,
Is my daily, hourly prayer.
Whom have I in heaven but thee?
Nothing else my joy can be.

Jesus, Master! I am thine; Keep me faithful, keep me near;
Let thy presence in me shine
All my homeward way to cheer.
Jesus! at thy feet I fall,
Oh, be thou my All-in-All!

THE MIDNIGHT CRY.

Christians Who Will Be Taken By Surprise When It Sounds and Will Have No Part in the Rapture.

BY DR. B. O. KINNEAR.*

BIBLICAL teaching distinctly evidences that Christ's second coming is divided into two stages: the first, where he descends to the air only, before the great tribulation;
the dead in Christ arising first,
"then we which are alive at his coming shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." The second portion, after this time of trouble, when he comes on the clouds of heaven, every eye shall see him, and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn when they behold him coming with the wise virgins and resurrected believers, "to the earth," to take vengeance on wickedness, and rule the whole world during the millennium.

Here, it seems to the writer, lies the secret and the explanation of that remarkable passage, "No man knoweth the day or the hour," which is constantly upheld as a conclusive argument that Christians shall not know the day or the hour.

It is neither possible nor probable, that we cannot discern the day and the hour when he comes to earth, because from the moment that Anti-christ makes a compact with the Jews, for 'one week' or seven years, after the ten kingdoms of Daniel and Revelation are formed out of the territories of the old Eastern and Western Roman empires, every prophetic student knows that from that date to the Saviour's descent on the earth, with the "chosen, the faithful and the true," is seven years and neither more nor less. They are now aware that when such a compact takes place, it is the last week of Daniel's prophecy of seventy weeks, therefore the result is sure. It is the last week of years, of this æon. There is further verification in the parable of the ten virgins of Matt. 25. They went forth to meet the bridegroom with their lamps, some with oil, some without, but all Christians, and believers in him as their Saviour; for the whole ten are likened to "The Kingdom of Heaven." "While the Bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept." In this generation what has happened thus far?
In 1837 Miller began to preach Christ's return in '44 and roused the attention of the Christian world, and he and his followers went out to meet the Bridegroom, but Christ did not come, and at once the whole church almost, fell asleep, because the Bridegroom tarried. There have been other but less extensive movements since that date of the same purport, and the Christian world has continued to slumber and sleep, though many prophetic students have continued to write and to warn that the days draw near.

The parable proceeds: "And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose"—the whole Christian Church arose—"and trimmed their lamps." Now such a cry is arising to-day, but the whole church or the mass of it, far from being aroused, seems to very largely and wholly indifferent to the matter, or impatient of it because the cry was not followed by his coming on previous occasions; or they believe that when Christ comes the judgment is the final one, and there is no such thing as a reign on earth of 1,000 years, etc., etc.; or they are wrapped in formal worship and do not search the Scriptures; or they claim the signs to be vague. This proves that the real midnight cry has not as yet started, for at that time all this indifference is to vanish, because then, they ask the wise virgins for their oil, and when told where to get it, go to those who sell; practically to those who already know the truth. Many may say, on reading the above, 'Well, I will wait until such an universal interest does take place, and will then study with the others.'
Very well; but note the consequence. "And while they [the foolish virgins] went to buy, the Bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut. Afterward, came the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily, I know you not. Watch, therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh."

TRUE POSSESSIONS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 11, Luke 12: 13-34.

NEARLY nineteen centuries have passed since Christ uttered the words which form the basis of the topic, yet the world has not learned the lesson they teach. Even Christ's professing followers, who bear his name, and love him devotedly are slow to accept his teaching in this matter. Yet the Great Teacher's philosophy was sound. True riches are within the man not outside of him. We recognize the soundness of the principle in some matters although we are slow to apply it. We know that a man who has a large library is not necessarily learned; that a miser may have millions and yet be living in poverty; that a man may have many houses but no home. Christ would have us carry the principle further. He would have us think less than we are disposed to do of these outside circumstances. He comes to us to open our eyes to a truer standard of values, as we might go to a man who was vainly and painfully trying to raise a crop on sterile soil, while he neglected a quarry on his farm which contained gold. We should tell him that he is wasting his time and urge him to turn his attention to a field in which his efforts would be better remunerated. So, Christ would have us spend our time to better purpose than that of mere money-getting. Money, he assures us, does not constitute true riches. The man whose riches were so great that the very storage was an embarrassment, Christ characterized as a fool, because he had left his soul impoverished. The rich man, as he conceived of him, was the man whose faith was strong, whose nature was gentle, docile and loving and who had God's approval. Whether he had much or little of this world's goods was a mere incident in his eyes, as little affecting his estimate as the height of his stature, or the color of his hair. Bunyan caught Christ's view of wealth when he drew the picture of a man so intent on raking the straws and stubble together that he did not see the angel who was offering him the golden crown. As to worldly wealth Christ reminds us that it may be lost and in any case must be resigned at death and urges us to seek possessions which can never be taken from us and which will be eternal. His followers were to be men seeking the highest things and the externals would surely be supplied. The fowls of the air and the grass of the field were examples of God's providential care. Men should trust him for these, not in idleness and inactivity, but with a concern for something better, more precious and more enduring.

THE LEAGUE SECRETARY.

Every member of an Epworth League, a Christian Endeavor Society, or a Baptist Young People's Union is aware that much of the organization's success or failure depends on the efficiency or indifference of the officers. The Secretary especially holds a responsible office. Some timely hints, based on experience, as to the best methods of discharging the Secretary's duties, are therefore valuable and may be helpful to Secretaries of any Society. In a lengthy communication on the subject, which the Secretary of an Epworth League in Brooklyn, N. Y., sends to the "Epworth Herald," the following hints are given: First to form a Secretarial Committee, consisting of a Secretary for each department of work. To each of these, beside the charge of the special department, he represents, should be assigned some branch of the general Secretary's duties. One might keep the records; a second the list of members; a third attend to the correspondence; and a fourth look after the statistics. He says: "My idea in having these various Secretaries as my committee is this: They bring me in touch with the workings and plans of their departments; and when letters of inquiry come asking how you do this or that, the letter is simply referred to that Secretary for reply, if I do not have the material at hand to answer it myself." It is not intended that the committee shall relieve the Secretary of work, but by taking up routine work, leave him free for the performance of special duties.

Next as to correspondence. The Secretary ought to be a valuable aid to each department through the mail. He may aid the Department of Spiritual Work by asking someone in regard to his soul's welfare just with a little note. By writing a note of condolence you are doing part of the work of the Department of Mercy and Help. The sending a programme of your next entertainment, with a cordial invitation to attend, to a stranger, is in the line of social work. What can you do that will come under the Department of Finance? Why, just write and tell that delinquent member that the Treasurer has presented his name to the Cabinet to be discontinued on account of two years' arrearage in dues, and urge him not to neglect this important matter. Just think of what can be done in letter-writing them to go to the country under the charge of the Country Week Association, and paid their rent while away. For several months past the members have been going to the Woman's Homeopathic Hospital the first Sunday in each month, and have held a service for the patients for which they were very thankful. Though our members are few, we do the work that lies before us in the care of these families."

AN INDIANA ASSOCIATION.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Evansville, Ind., has the credit of possessing the second finest Association building in the State. It is surpassed only by that of Indianapolis where the organization is older than that of Evansville by twenty-two years and is in a city of more than double the population. The handsome building of which we give a picture on this page covers an area of seventy-five by a hundred feet is five stories in height and cost, with the land on which it stands, $78,500 of which all but about $10,000 has been paid. The Association was organized in 1876 and has now 585 members about one-half of whom are on the active list. The religious meetings have an unusually large average attendance. Five secular branches are also taught and there is an excellent gymnasium with a competent teacher.

THE BAPTIST BOYS' BRIGADE.

The rapid growth of the Brigade movement is probably unknown to Baptist pastors and churches in country districts. It is well that they should know how it is progressing in the cities, as there are many places in the country where it may be easily

Rev. W. E. Waterbury, of Clinton, Mass., is Secretary or Adjutant.

Mr. Deming suggests that as far as possible, pastors who have companies of the Baptist Boys' Brigade connected with their churches should arrange their plans to attend the national anniversaries at Saratoga next May, and there a meeting will be held to effect a permanent organization for the United States. Mr. Deming will be pleased to supply information to any pastor wishing to form a Brigade.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

During the five-weeks' revival at Aurora, Ind., the Epworth League held a half-hour prayer-meeting each evening previous to the regular service.

A grand rally of the Christian Endeavor Societies of Boston, Mass., is to be held on Feb. 1, in the People's Church. Several officers of the United Society are expected to take part.

One of the most thriving and enthusiastic Baptist Young People's Unions in Missouri is in the southwestern part of the State at Seneca, on the Indian Territory border. There are three other prosperous Unions in the Association.

The mercy and help department of the Epworth League at Mount Vernon, Ind., distributed, at Christmas, a wagon-load of flour, meal, sugar, coffee, potatoes, candies, nuts, toys, and clothing, besides several wagon-loads of coal.

Since the Mills meetings the Y. M. C. A. of Concord, N. H., has flourished as never before. In its two departments, Junior and Senior, its paid memberships now number 576. Its present course of lectures and concerts is largely patronized.

Christian Endeavor Day February 2nd, or some day in the week in which that day occurs, will be observed very generally by societies in all parts of the world this year. The celebration will not be a glorification of Christian Endeavor or its history, but the special features of the day will be a missionary thank offering for the blessings of the year.

Rev. S. E. Lathrop, of Washburn, Wis., has led the Young People's Society in a novel down-town work. Every Sunday evening a song service is held in one of the halls, interspersed with readings and declamations. The children of non-church-goers, Roman Catholic families and some saloon-keepers are reached, and the house is crowded at every service.

It is expected that upwards of 1,500 delegates will attend the Jubilee International Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations in London next year. There are upwards of seventy associations in and around London alone. Altogether, in the various countries of the world, the work is carried on in 5158 centres, and has an aggregate registered membership of 467,515.

A Christian Endeavor Society in Spain is in flourishing condition. Its secretary writes: Since the beginning of this school year our society in the Instituto Internacional in San Sebastian has held weekly meetings in addition to those held on the second Sunday of each month. For these we use the uniform topics and Christian Endeavor hymn book, and so feel quite in touch with the Christian Endeavor word in other lands.

In England the growth of Christian Endeavor Societies of late has been remarkable, a thousand societies being enrolled and doubtless many more in existence. English Endeavorers have taken for their motto, "1804 societies in 1894." The next convention of the English societies will be held in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Mr. Spurgeon's church, and it is expected that its great seating capacity will be taxed to its utmost.

Recognition was paid to the B. Y. P. U. as an efficient auxiliary to missionary work at the recent conference at Lawrence, Kans. Mr. W. H. Keith, the President of the Ottawa Union, was present, and addressed the Kansas Unions, and Rev. W. B. Hutchinson and Rev. G. W. Cassidy followed with earnest presentation of the claims of Foreign Missions. The pastor of the Lawrence Church had his Boys' Brigade on hand, and gave tests of the value of the movement alone! When it occurred to me I was overwhelmed with the thoughts of what that department could accomplish if it was managed in the right way.

A PHILADELPHIA CIRCLE.

The prevalent distress is proving the value of the Order of King's Daughters. The various circles are doing the very best kind of charitable work in visiting the needy personally investigating their need and giving the kind of help that will help them best. A specimen circle is the Faith, Hope, and Charity Circle of Philadelphia. Miss Ellen S. Humphreys, the Secretary, in her report to headquarters, writes: "The Circle has been helping four families. One consists of two old ladies—sisters—quite poor. One of them is helpless. The members visit them frequently and contribute to their comfort by taking dainties and reading to them. One of the members takes her sewing-school children Saturday afternoons to sing to them. Another family consists of a mother and daughter. The former is blind. She sews carpet rags, and the daughter knits for a living. Last Summer we arranged for organized and equally beneficial. A few statistics and suggestions from the head of the movement, Rev. M. R. Deming, are published by "The Baptist Union." It appears that there are now on file at the headquarters of the Baptist Boys' Brigade, 501 United Charities Building, New York, the enrolment papers of 139 companies in the United States and one in Canada. Many other companies have reported to headquarters, but have not as yet sent in the enrolment blanks. Sixty-five of the companies are in New York State, and of these, fifty-four are in New York City and Brooklyn. Among them are three companies composed entirely of German boys, two of Italian and one of colored boys. The providence of God in this movement was never so manifest as now. The divine blessing manifested by the conversion of the boys in many of the companies is sufficient proof. The control in New York and Brooklyn is vested in a committee appointed by the Baptist City Mission. The work in New England is well organized by the appointment of a committee by the companies of that section, of which Rev. Alex. Blackburn, D. D., of Cambridge, is the President, and

A Noble Work Recalled.

Aivassovsky, the Famous Russian Painter, immortalizes on Canvas the Generosity of "The Christian Herald" Readers during the Great Famine.

O good deed ever dies with the doing. In some form—it may be as a grateful memory, or as a kindly influence acting upon others—it lives on, and perpetuates itself.

A remarkable illustration of the truth of this beautiful philosophy comes to us from Russia in a most unexpected and agreeable form. Aivassovsky, the famous Russian painter, whose costly canvases of ocean and landscape adorn the walls of royal palaces and public buildings throughout that country, and who occupies an exalted position among European artists—has immortalized on canvas the story of the cargo of food sent by the readers of this journal to the starving peasants of his own country. We are privileged to-day to present on this page, a reproduction of this famous picture, into which the artist has thrown a world of grateful enthusiasm, such as can only be fully appreciated by a sight of the painting itself. The scene is in the famine-stricken province of Riazan. News has just been received by the authorities, of the arrival of the food-laden "Leo" at St. Petersburg, and simultaneously with this intelligence, the first consignment has just reached the village. The poor peasants are wild with delight. Down the village street at headlong pace comes a "droschky," its three spirited horses held well in hand by a sturdy driver, while upon a pile of flour sacks stands a peasant girl, holding aloft an American flag. Flocking out from their quaint-looking, gabled houses, the villagers crowd the dusty street but open a wide lane for the flying "droschky" and its burden. One can imagine the joy in Riazan, that day, when it became known that six carloads of flour had reached the district, and that Count Tolstoi at Klekoti, Mrs. Putilof at Bogoravlenski, Mr. Babin at Hrushchovo, and Mr. Semenov at Astapovo, were sending out supplies to all the starving families. That flag-decked train of 100 cars, laden with flour, potatoes, milk and delicacies, which started from the Nevski dock at St. Petersburg for the interior, brought more joy and gladness to Russian hearts than the generous donors in America can ever know. It is this national spirit of gratitude that M. Aivassovsky has caught and pictured on his great canvas, a tribute that is a fitting recognition of one of the most magnificent examples of self-denial and broad Christian sympathy ever recorded in the history of our own people or in the experience of Russia. The thousands of subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Fund of that year will cherish through life the memory of the pleasant and valuable service they were privileged to render, when the food their offerings procured was the means of saving unnumbered lives.

It is a sad and singular coincidence, that at the time when Aivassovsky's noble picture is reproduced in these columns, the readers of this journal should again be engaged in a work of charity, similar in many respects to that which this picture commemorates, but this time at home, instead of in a foreign land. The awful destitution in New York City is exciting the commiseration of the whole country, and it is pleasant to observe the readiness with which those who have been blessed with a degree of material prosperity are responding to our call for help. On another page, THE CHRIS-only woman involuntarily breaks into at the sight of the tiny beings is very sweet to masculine ears. It was the first language they ever knew, and, in spite of the jest or smile, the sweetest on wife's or sweetheart's lips. They may laugh, too, at the little garden tools, which seem like playthings in their strength; but in their hearts they associate, and rightly, refinement of character and life with the pursuit of gardening. And as for the woman who does not care for her own sex, and boldly avows it, she creates only an unfavorable impression against her own self for a sweeping condemnation of a sex which contains innumerable examples of all that is beautiful and worthy in human character.

Woman's Work in Russia.

In all there are about 700 women doctors in Russia, and many of these occupy important positions in hospitals and work-houses, in educational establishments, in factories and works of various kinds, and in government institutions, while others hold appointments in the service of municipal bodies. The remuneration of these different posts varies from $1,000 downward. So far as private practice is concerned, there is one woman doctor who makes an income of $9,000 per annum—a phenomenally good record. But the average income of the woman medical practitioner in private practice is something under $1,500 a year.

The Best Thing in Life.

Here is a spiritual gem, from one of the late Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's letters,

"THE LEAST OF THESE."

SHE had little of earthly beauty,
She had less of earthly lore;
She climbed by a path so narrow,
Such wearisome burdens bore!
And she came with heart a-trembling
To the warder at Heaven's door.
And said, "There were hearts of heroes;"
She said, "There were hands of might;
I had only my little children,
That call to me day and night;
I could only soothe their sorrows,
Their childish hearts make light."
And she bowed her head in silence.
And she hid her face in shame;
When, out from a blaze of glory,
A form majestic came;
And sweeter than all heaven's music,
Lo, someone called her name!

SUPERFLUOUS WOMEN.

EACH passing year helps to define more clearly the position woman is to occupy in the industrial and professional world. There has been a great deal said and written of late regarding the possibilities of women crowding men out of employments which till now have been exclusively filled by the sterner sex, but very much of it is absurd and unfounded. The truth is that up to the present moment, women do not crowd men out of proper masculine callings to any appreciable extent; the employments they select are such as are, as a whole, distinctly suited to their sex and physical abilities.

On this subject, an observant writer in a Western journal says:

"It is only the nice, easy, clean, unfruitful employments, the 'light occupations,' that are overcrowded. Effeminate men crowded these before they were invaded by women. It would be a gain for society if women were to fill them entirely, if it can be done by the superfluous women. It is contrary to nature's scheme to set men poring over ledgers, copying briefs, and acting as light indoors salesmen. It not only wastes their labor, but nullifies their brawn, and diminishes their vitality. It is a matter of Unlovable Women.

There are three kinds of women who are of doubtful value as acquaintances—those who do not love children, who do not love flowers, and who openly declare that they do not like other women. There is something wanting in them, and in all probability its place is supplied by some unlovely trait. Men may smile and jest a little over the tenderness lavished on a baby, says a thoughtful writer in "Worthington's Magazine," but, after all, the prattle every woman which may help to inspire some ardent young soul to the higher life: "Hardly anything that could be desired in this life has been withheld from me," wrote the distinguished pastor. "I have had that which many covet and seek for in vain; my life all through has been a very happy one; it may be said, without exception, taking it from beginning to end, to have been a life of extraordinary prosperity and happiness. But there is nothing in this world, it seems to me, that is to be desired for one single moment in comparison with the life beyond. If that life is all that we have been taught it is—and I believe it to be that and abundantly more—then let no man wish to stay here. It is true that the going of one and another leaves a wound in the heart of those that are left behind, but it is true also that God heals such wounds speedily."

A Little Word.

A little word in kindness spoken,
A motion or a tear,
Has often healed the heart that's broken
And made a friend sincere.

SYNOPSIS OF EARLIER CHAPTERS.

The first scene of the story is a week-evening service in the Jeremy Taylor Memorial Church, Brooklyn. The pastor, Rev. William C. Barnes and his wife notice among the strangers present, a lady whose features seem to Mrs. Barnes strangely familiar. She cannot identify her, but later, as she is sitting at her own window, she sees the same lady pass and recognizes her as Mrs. Alice Paull, an old schoolfellow. She raises the window and calls "Alice, Alice," but there is no reply. Alice Paull, was Alice Lanier, when Mrs. Barnes went to school with her, the daughter of the wealthy Mr. Lanier, who is now dead and his business is in the hands of the son, Mr. Roger Lanier, Mrs. Paull's brother. Her husband, Ernest Paull, whom she married eighteen years before the opening of the story, was an idle, pleasure-loving man, whose neglect and unkindness she had patiently borne. He had lost several business positions and ultimately had embezzled the money of his employers and absconded. He confessed his crime in a letter to his wife's brother, who carried the news to Mrs. Paull. Shocked by the intelligence, she goes out at night, not telling her daughter Marie, or her Scotch servant, Elspeth, where she is going. Wandering aimlessly around, she turns into the church, where Mrs. Barnes sees her. On her return to her home she falls sick of brain fever. Her physician, Dr. Bacon, engages a good Christian woman, Mrs. Williams by name, to nurse her. In conversation with Mr. Roger Lanier, Mrs. Williams admits that she, too, is a deserted wife, and Mr. Lanier is impelled by her sympathy to tell her the story of Mrs. Paull, his sister.

"I WILL be frank with you throughout our discussion of this miserable business," continued Mr. Lanier. "Mr. Paull will never come back to his home and my sister knows it. He has disgraced his children with himself, and deserted a faithful, devoted wife. I brought this news to her on the day she was taken ill. What has happened since then is in consequence of what I was obliged to tell her. You know the whole story now. You see what you meant, without comprehending why it was, when you talked of broken springs and ungeared wheels."

She had borne herself thus far with such equanimity, and she look so strong and steady that he was utterly unprepared to see her sit down as if her knees had given way, and lifting her apron to her eyes began to sob hysterically.

"The poor dear! the poor suffering dear! O, Mr. Lanier! how can any man be so cruel? God forgive him for bringing such sorrow upon her and her innocent babies!" Roger Lanier did not say "Amen!" to that. His face hardened, not relented, at the prayer. His eyes were sternly unmerciful.

The nurse got hold of herself almost immediately.

"It isn't often I give way like that, sir," she pleaded in her quaintly-respectful way. "But I've had a pretty hard strain, lately, you know, and this caught me by surprise. I'm obliged to you for telling me the truth, and proud and thankful that you feel to trust me to hold my tongue. What you've said makes me a grain less hopeful. I won't deny that. But it will move me to great boldness in carrying the dear lady and her grief to the Great Physician, now that I really understand how much she needs him. There's nothing impossible with him, Mr. Lanier, and he is very pitiful and of great mercy to his children. Our extremity is his best opportunity. That's a blessed saying—'most good enough to be in the Bible itself.'"

Elspeth, supposing her mistress to be asleep, had slipped away to attend to her domestic duties, leaving the chamber-door ajar. Mrs. Williams entered soundlessly, cast a glance at the bed, and seeing the occupant quiet, took a seat out of range should she stir, and buried her face in her hands.

This woman, to whom she had been sent to minister, high-born and delicately-nurtured, carried a cross of like form and weight with hers. With home, and kindred and wealth at her call, she had been swept out to sea by waves as rough as those that had overwhelmed her, years ago; had fallen, tainting with thirst, beside the fountains of Marah. Widely separated the two might be by education and social position, they were sisters in the sorest sorrow that can visit a woman's heart.

God must have meant much in directing her feet to this house. His ways were always wise and always full of meaning to those who cared to study them. He did nothing idly, and he made no mistakes.

She whispered under her breath one of the proverbs of which she had an exhaustless store:

"Whoso will observe the wonderful providences of God, shall have wonderful providences to observe."

She must move warily, for life and death might hang upon her efforts to pour balm into that wounded heart, and to raise the fallen spirit. In all the narrow and critical passes through which she had been mercifully guided, she had known few more perplexing than this.

"And, like a blind, conceited bat, I had it in my mind to hang up that picture to-night, as she was sound asleep, that her eyes might light on it the first thing in the morning, as she said her husband meant they should when he gave it to her. I was that pleased with the idea of giving her something pleasant to think of, that I could hardly wait for night to come. What risky things we short-sighted creatures are let to do, when we get to priding ourselves upon our own smartness! I do declare I've no respect for Mary Williams, if she does set herself up as a 'nurse, &c.,' when I catch her in such conceited ways. Talk of the mercies of the Lord being from everlasting to everlasting! They ain't a circumstance compared with his patience with our foolishness! That's just everlastingest."

A restless movement upon the bed called her to her feet. The gas was low, and she raised it to a cheerful flame on perceiving through the obscurity that Mrs. Paull was looking about her.

"You've had a good sleep, ma'am!" cheerily congratulatory. "In my humble opinion, there's no better time o' the day for dozing than twilight. 'Seems if 'twas made a-purpose for us to catch our breath in after the day's work is done, and before 'the evening shades prevail,' as the hymn says. Do you feel equal to sitting up in bed while you eat your supper?"

"If I must eat it," said the listless voice, "wouldn't it be less trouble to take it as I am? Less fatiguing for you and for me?"

"O, as to me, no way you could contrive would fatigue my tough bones and sinews. But I think appetite comes easier when one is 'n't flat on her back, as if 'twasn't intended that human creatures should eat in that shiftless, lazy way. And come to think of it"—with her jolly little gurgle—"I don't know of any animal that prefers to take his victuals in that position, without 'tis a shark. They do say he has to turn over on his back before he can catch holt of his prey, and that many a swimmer has been saved on account of his being made that way."

"There now! Is that comfortable? Don't say, 'Yes,' without it is entirely right. It will amuse me to keep on trying till I get them so as to suit you. There's as many ways of fixing pillows as there are people to lie upon them. They ought to fit into all the tired hollows and support every bone, and give into every joint, or they are not just as they ought to be."

"They are very comfortable, thank you." Mrs. Paull lay back, with a sigh, in the downy nest arranged by the deft hands. "What time is it?"

"I heard the whistles blow for six, a few minutes ago. I thought maybe that was what woke you."

"Only six! I thought it much later. The night is all to come."

"Time will go twice as fast when once you're up and dressed," said the nurse, blithely over her shoulder, in going into the adjoining room.

CHAPTER VII.

"Be sure that if you do your very best in that which is laid upon you daily, you will not be left without sufficient help when some mightier occasion arises."

—J. N. Grou.

"Why should I start at the plough of my Lord, that maketh deep furrows on my soul? I know He is no idle husbandman. He purposeth a crop."

—Samuel Rutherford.

Upon a table in the room that had been the guest-chamber of the house, Mrs. Williams had arranged medicines, glasses, spirit-lamp and kettle, and other appliances of her profession and specific work she had on hand. She never dropped, or measured, or mixed a dose in the patient's sight or hearing, or arranged a tray, or cut up food in her presence. Aladdin's slaves were not better-drilled in making an appearance all ready for waiting or action, in the precise nick of time than the born New Englander who had not known the discipline of regulation "training."

To protect the polished top of the table from stain, or hot liquid, she had covered it with a folded newspaper, and this with a napkin. The latter was spotted in several places, she noticed, now, and having administered Mrs. Paull's tonic and lighted the lamp under the vessel containing beef-tea, the neat-handed attendant took the moment of leisure for removing the soiled, and spreading in its place clean linen. A like instinct of orderliness caused her to reverse the newspaper. It was a secular sheet of manifold pages, and a Sunday issue. Accordingly two columns of the last conspicuous page were devoted to religious intelligence and moral selections. Right in the middle of one of these columns was an extract headed "Good Advice."

"If I don't need that at this identical minute—good measure, shaken down, pressed together and a-running over, nobody does!" reflected the nurse, and, forthwith and then and there, proceeded to make it her own; standing under the gas-burner, one eye and both ears attent upon the warming beef-tea. Having gone through it, twice, she picked up a pair of scissors, cut out the paragraph, and tucked it for future reference into her Bible that lay on the mantel.

"If that ain't a 'find!'" she ejaculated softly.

The contents of the sauce-pan were simmering. With a look of unwonted abstraction, she poured the liquid into a cup; put with it upon a tray a strip of toast, and took it into the other room. When she brought back the cup and plate, she could not resist the temptation to read the "find" over again.

"Acquire the habit of living by the minute. Take care of this moment now while you have it, the next when it comes, and you will not then neglect any. You can live this minute without sin! Is it not so? Do it then. Never mind what is before you. Do not sin now. When each successive minute comes, do likewise. If you will do this—if you will observe this simple rule, you will not fail, you will not sin at all. Days are made up of minutes; if each one is sinless, the day will be so. Now try this. Nothing is easier, nothing is wiser. Live by the minute. Carry on your business, trade, labor, study, and plan for the future by the minute. Trust in God now; do God's will now; do not offend God now.—BISHOP FOSTER."

"Wouldn't that go straight to Mr. Stevens' heart?" she said inly to her edified self. "I'll send it to Mrs. Barnes, and when she's got her share of honey out of it, I'll mail it to him. I wonder if Bishop Foster is alive or dead? I'd go far to thank him for this brook by the way. It's made me lift up my head—and my heart. There's another of the blessed ones whose feet are set in the Royal Road. Pretty soon they will be a great multitude that no man can number. To come upon this right in the heart of one of them Sunday papers, is like finding a pearl in a stale oyster. It's a lesson in charity, too, if I take it in the right way. There's some good in everything, and after this I'll never say that the Sunday paper mayn't be the means of saving a soul."

"The question for this one of my minutes is why I was led to light upon this at this particular time, when my whole soul is going out in prayer and longing to hit upon some way of comforting her. Nothing happens by chance. Mr. Stevens says the day is as full of guide-posts to duty as a paling fence is of pickets. Is this one of them?"

She took the cutting into the front chamber with her, holding it in her left hand, while the right brushed a minute crumb from the counterpane. In her eyes and lingering about the corners of her mouth, was a happy smile.

Mrs. Paull's languid regards passed from the printed slip to her attendant's face, and an instinct of politeness, rather than curiosity, prompted a question:

"Is that something that you would like me to see?"

"I suppose you wonder why I am carrying it about with me, like the woman in the Bible, with the piece of silver she found by lighting the candle and sweeping out the corners," she said, the happy laugh mellowing yet more the voice already so soothing to the ear. "I made up my mind, a great while ago, that the pleasantness and misery of this world are made up of many littles, and that those are the best-off who make much of the day and hour of small things. We all know that whatever God sends has a meaning, and will accomplish that whereunto it is sent. And, that if we keep our eyes and ears open all the time, we may come to see a great deal more of what he does mean than we're apt to believe, if we haven't tried that plan of living. We've fallen so much into the habit of saying—'What he does we can't know here, but we shall know Hereafter,' that most of us think it is a religious duty to wait for everything until that Hereafter."

"But those were Christ's own words."

A tiny ray of satisfaction kindled at the back of the nurse's eyes.

"If I can once arouse her to argue with me, it will be a sign she's waking up!" she thought.

"Yes—but he said them to Peter, and about an altogether different matter, reproving the poor, rash fellow for over-inquisitiveness. He blames nobody for considering his ways and being guided by them. Now, it seems to me, and I'm sure the Bible backs me up in it—not in so many words of course, but in the spirit of it—it seems to me that that way of taking life is a good deal like a cake, with all the fruit settled at the bottom. 'Taint nice, nor yet wholesome. It's better cooking and better religion to flour the raisins, and citron, and currants, and mix 'em well through the batter, so they won't sink into one heavy streak."

Her prattle was so ingenuous in style, and so brightly delivered that her auditor was beguiled into the reality of listening. For the first time, Mrs. Williams saw the perfect gleam in a spontaneous smile.

"And is that"—looking at the cutting—"a new recipe for insuring success in fruit-cake making?"

Nurse Williams laughed outright.

"You've no idea what a clever guess you've made, ma'am! If it wouldn't bore you to hear me read it, you'd be ready to laugh yourself, to see how exactly you've hit it. I'll hang this banner-screen on the gas-burner to keep the light from your eyes before I begin."

While making arrangements for the other's comfort, she twittered gently on:

"It came about in what some folks would consider an odd way. The oddest things are often the most natural if we see them in the right light. I was in the brownest sort of a study when I happened upon this cutting. 'Twas just as though an angel poked it right under my eyes, and said, 'How is it that you have no faith? Here's what you need.' There's no doubt that such things do happen. And why not, to be sure? He gives them charge to see that we don't stub our toes in our daily walk. I heard a minister say once that passage meant in the language—Hebrew I think it was—it was first written in—'Lest thou touch thy foot against a very little stone.' A pebble, I suppose, and there's different sizes of pebbles."

"But here's my receipt for mixing the fruit even all through the cake."

She read better than could have been expected from a woman of her limited education, giving each syllable due consideration, and was heedful of punctuation-points.

"Some sick folks—mostly men—like to be amused by having the newspapers read, and children can be kept still any length of time with nice little stories, and it's surprising what an effect reading the Psalms—the comforting, promising ones—has upon nervous and low-spirited invalids. As for the Gospels—they suit all kinds, I find."

When the article was finished, she saw that Mrs. Paull had turned upon her side, and slipped her hand under her cheek. The gleam of the sunken eyes was dimmed, not quenched. It was something that she had shifted her position voluntarily, but her tone was not encouraging:

"I know just what manner of man wrote that," she said, a slight flavor of scorn in the feeble voice. "A pious, easygoing soul who never had deep experience of any kind. Life had gone upon velvet for him, and he judged other people's trials and temptations by his own."

“YOU have lost your natural sweetness of temper, and have grown a sour-hearted, loveless teacher of these people. Why do you not take up some honest work, Althorp, to gain the advancement in life which talent and education warrant? Set these working people the example of a good home with a wife and happy children, and a prosperous industry swelling your bank account yearly. Preach by being yourself a happy man. It is the best way of preaching.”

Build your own shop, manufacture your own patents. You have several. Just where you stand to-day, in possibilities, stood the Governor Randalls of forty years ago. Men prate that times have changed. Yes, because so few men nowadays dare to think out and live their own lives. Every man is forced to belong to some iron-bound association. As for me, I will take no vows but to my country and my church. The land is yet free. The church of the New Testament, if we could only return to it as it was, a simple company of followers of Jesus, moving about where he led—that would be free. Times have changed, say you? The sunlight, the air, the earth, the forces of nature, are the same. God himself breaks the monopolies by giving us electricity when steam is cornered, aluminum when iron is cornered, great Texas and new Canada when land is cornered. It is a beautiful world and a grand age, if the new reformers will let us alone. These quack doctors of the world, who are dosing the age with the new truth—out on them! There is one old truth, the Bible you reject; one great Physician, the Christ in whom you were most of you christened. He loved this world. He called us to admire the lilies which he had created. I want to live here long. To truly and wisely love this life is to make sure of the next.

“If I live I will keep to this old creed. I will wish to do good to many men. I will do good to many men. I will do no willful injury to any man. I will use such means as I have with my own hand, helping one by one other men to live their own lives. I will do this myself, not by machinery. If I were very rich, as I never expect to be, I would still do this—by my own hand, I say, not by aldermen, not by managers, nor by trustees, nor by executors.”

THRIFT IN THE HOME.

Many families would be thrifty and economical if they only knew how; but as they do not they simply go on in the old routine. The end of each year finds them in very nearly the same condition financially and in other respects as the preceding year—perhaps a little more discouraged. Dickens has Micawber solemnly conjure David Copperfield “to take warning by his fate; and to observe that if a man had twenty pounds a year for his income, and spent nineteen pounds, nineteen shillings and sixpence, he would be happy, but that if he spent twenty pounds one, he would be miserable.” Living within the income is not impossible, and the following chapters will indicate to those who are willing to try how it may be accomplished. Living beyond the income has been one of the causes of hard times whenever such times exist. Living within the income is the only sure cure for hard times.

Living within the income will make hard times good and good times better. By preserving health and making proper use of time the income can be increased.
Wasted time, wasted energy, wasted health, wasted food, wasted clothing, wasted fuel, wasted money, and all the minor wastes accompanying these of resulting therefrom, have impoverished millions of families and resulted in untold misery. Wastefulness in a home is contagious, as it were, and not only children, but other members of a family, are likely to carry the same careless methods of the parents into all their occupations. Because of a lack of proper precept and example having been set before the boys and girls at home, many otherwise bright prospects for a successful career have been ruined.

Your Laundress' Back, and her time, are not the only things that you save, if she uses Pearline. You'll get your clothes washed without that ruinous rub, rub, rub that wears them out quickly. It's a gain for her and a gain for you, and they're washed just as safely as they could be with the best soap—only a great deal more easily.
But see for yourself that what she uses is Pearline—the original washing-compound; the best; the one proved to be perfectly harmless. All these washing-powders that you're warned against are only imitations of Pearline.

It makes delicious Bouillon, and is invaluable to add zest and flavor to soups and meat dishes.

After the Grip

Convalescence is very slow, and to recover the health-tone a good tonic is absolutely necessary. Hood's Sarsaparilla has been used with wonderful success as a building-up medicine and blood purifier after attacks of the Grip, after Typhoid Fever, Diphtheria, Pneumonia or other prostrating diseases. It possesses just the building-up effect so much needed; it vitalizes and enriches the thin and impoverished blood, and it invigorates the kidneys and stimulates the liver so that they resume regular and healthy action. Thousands have taken

Hood's Sarsaparilla

As a preventive of the Grip with success. Thousands have found in it restoration to health and strength after this dreaded complaint. Be sure to get Hood's, because Hood's Cures.

Hood's Pills cure Constipation by restoring the peristaltic action of the alimentary canal.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh to yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Everything I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aenal Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh. ELI BROWN, Jacksboro, Tenn.

AN OBSTINATE CAPTAIN.

In urging sinners to heed the many warnings addressed to them and pleading with men not to rush headlong on certain destruction, an evangelist said: "I remember a great storm which, many years ago, raged along the East coast of Aberdeenshire. While it was at its height, the steamer arrived outside the harbor bar, and made signal for a pilot. A pilot went out, and advised the captain of the steamer not to attempt the bar, as the storm was so fierce, and the water over the bar was very low; but the captain would not take the pilot's advice. Into the harbor he had determined to get; and if the pilot would not take him, then he must needs take it himself. The pilot warned him of the foolishness and danger of his attempt; but the captain was headstrong, and the pilot left the steamer. On and on it came. Inside the harbor the senior pilot stood with speaking trumpet in hand to sound a last word of warning across the wave: 'Put back! put back!' he cried; but the foolish, criminally foolish master kept on his course, and 'crash,' his ship was on the bar. Quickly the storm dashed it to pieces, and very few of the crew and passengers were saved."

The supreme importance of purifying the blood, and the peculiar efficacy which Hood's Sarsaparilla has in this direction, makes it the medicine of modern times. It positively cures catarrh.

A Good Child

SAVIOUR PASSING BY.

WHEN the Saviour passes by,
Sinner, lift to him thine eye,
Ask him then to lead you through
Ask him then to make you true.

Loving Saviour, everywhere
Listening to the feeblest prayer,
Every sound of thanks and praise,
That to him is upward raised.

Jesus now is passing by;
Sinner, now lift up thine eye,
Lift to him thy heart in prayer,
Asking for his guiding care.

—ANNA V. KING.

SLAUGHTERED IN AFRICA.

Lobengula, the king of Matabeleland in Africa, having been driven from his own territory, after a reign of frightful cruelty, is now seeking to found a new kingdom in Zambesia. The troops of the British South African Company pursued his flying impis from Buluwayo, the capital, southward. Lobengula's warriors succeeded in a bushing a force of the British South African Company's troops under Major Wilson and the latter were slain to a man. The troops had pursued the Matabele fugitives across the Shangani river and when the flying impis made a stand, the pursuers found themselves hemmed in on every side and were soon overcome. A portrait of Major Wilson is given above.

MAJOR WILSON.

A LOAN TO THE LORD.

A poor man with an empty purse came one day to Michael Feneberg, the godly pastor of Seeg, in Bavaria, and begged three crowns, that he might finish his journey. It was all the money Feneberg had, but as he besought him so earnestly in the name of Jesus, in the name of Jesus he gave it. Immediately afterward, he found himself in great outward need, and seeing no way of relief he prayed, saying, "Lord I lent thee three crowns; thou hast not yet returned them, and thou knowest how I need them. Lord, I pray thee, give them back." The same day a messenger brought a money-letter, which Gasper, his assistant, reached over to Feneberg, saying, "Here, father, is what you expended." The letter contained two hundred thalers, or about one hundred and fifty dollars, which the poor traveler had begged from a rich man for the vicar; and the childlike old man, in joyful amazement, cried out, "Ah, dear Lord, one dare ask nothing of thee, for straightway thou makest one feel so much ashamed."

Marion Harland.

Our readers are familiar with the sprightly writings of Marion Harland. Perhaps, however, they do not know that "Common Sense in the Household," written near the beginning of her career, has been one of her most successful publications. Over 50,000 copies have been sold, and now after 21 years a new edition, happily called "The Majority Edition," has come from the press.

Twenty-one years ago baking powders were not known to any great extent and Marion Harland specified cream of tartar and soda in her recipes. The new edition, however, is up to the times, and we find the use of baking powder is recommended, and on page 264 the following:

"When the housewife can purchase a really good baking powder, that will spare her trouble and risk, it is wise to use it. After faithful trial of many—some bad, more indifferent, and a few good—I give the preference decidedly to Cleveland's Baking Powder. I know this Powder to be free from ammonia, alum, and other objectionable ingredients of some highly-lauded compounds; bread, cakes, etc., made with this keep fresh longer than when mixed with any other I have tried, and are less friable; and a small quantity goes further than half as much again of any other baking powder of which I have knowledge."

Many of the recipes in the new edition specify Cleveland's Baking Powder. Marion Harland evidently intends to leave no doubt as to where she stands on this question.

DESCRIPTION OF VARIETIES.

CORN—DUNGAN'S WHITE PROLIFIC—The best corn in cultivation. Taking more premiums at our State Fairs than all other corns; is a remarkable yielder; nearly half the stalks producing two large well-developed ears. Our illustration is a fair representation of an ear, and a field in shock. The ears are very large; cob small; grains deep and pure white. No corn grower can afford to be without this corn. One of our subscribers last year grew NINETEEN and ONE-HALF bushels from a single ear.

OATS—WHITE SUPERIOR—These oats were awarded first medal from Indiana at World's Fair. They are of excellent quality; heavy croppers and will be sold very high this year, and we give our readers an opportunity of getting a start of these prize oats in advance by ordering this collection.

BEET—EARLY BLOOD TURNIP—Best beet grown for home use; round, good form; single tap root; flesh dark red; very sweet, fine grained and tender.

RADISH—BECKERT'S CHARTER—A long, fine variety of re-cent introduction; distinct and desirable; quality of the best, growing to a large size without getting pithy.

WATER-MELON—KOLB'S GEM—The leading variety with all and every bark; flesh red, sweet and melting; the vines are very hardy and productive.

PEPPER—GOLDEN UPRIGHT—Produces the fruit upright on the stems, as shown in cut. The fruit is fully double the size of the Golden Dawn; beautiful color golden, tinged with red where exposed to the sun; mild and well flavored.

LETTUCE—CALIFORNIA ALL HEART—Originated in California; no praise is too high for its merits; its superior does not exist; its handsome shape and appearance is well shown in our engraving.

POTATO—HUNTINGTON'S HOOSIER—Offered this year for the first time. Though it will be very high priced, we have secured from them enough to put one potato in each collection. It is a very early potato and of excellent quality, and will prove a valuable acquisition to your potato list.

FLOWER SEED—The varieties we offer are too well known to need any description. Pinks, Pansies, Asters and Mignonette are the standards, and are admired and highly prized by all lovers of flowers.

A gloriously beautiful acquisition of American origin. Absolutely pure white, as clear as alabaster and as lustrous as satin. The flowers, of remarkable substance, are borne on long stiff stems, are extra large, with broad round standards that stand up boldly without reflex or curl.
The plants are robust, compact and branching, producing such a prodigious abundance of flowers that the plants appear as if covered with snow. From one plant, specially cultivated, we have cut in one season the seemingly incredible number of 1,035 sprays of bloom! In earliness it outrivals all com-

MISSIONARY PERILS IN PERU.

Pioneer Murdered and a Preacher Imprisoned in an Effort to Plant the Banner of the Cross in the Land of the Incas—Progress of the Work—Proposed Memorial Chapel

AMONG recent reports of progress in missionary work one of the most gratifying is that of Dr. Thos. B. Wood who is laboring in Peru. He was in New York lately and called at the office of this journal to express the gratitude of the brethren in that land for the service rendered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, three years ago, in calling the attention of the Christian world to the valiant struggle they are waging there in the face of fierce opposition. He informed us that the little church in Callao is still holding together, that the converts are themselves preaching the Gospel, that five schools have been opened, and the people, although very poor, are contributing out of their meagre earnings, funds for extending the work. They have also in contemplation the erection of a stone chapel, and Dr. Wood, we understand, secured contributions during his stay in New York to the amount of a thousand dollars for the purchase of a site on the chief street of Callao. Every one who is praying for the advancement of Christ's kingdom must rejoice in this news; for not in Africa, or China, or any heathen land, are there difficulties so stupendous in the way of the progress of the Gospel as there are in this South American republic. Those who join the church have to encounter social ostracism, and those who preach the Gospel are liable to a persecution so fierce that imprisonment and even death itself may be their fate at any time. That converts are being made and that the Gospel is still being preached, are evidence of the devotion and consecration of the workers.

The history of this mission is one of the most thrilling of the many glorious records on the rolls of the Christian Church. It was planted with intrepid devotion, was watered with the blood of the first pioneer, and cost his successor a long and painful imprisonment. God's people cannot fail to take an interest in a work inaugurated at such a cost, and will surely pray for the success of a church for which one man gave his life and another his liberty. The effort originated in the longing of a colporteur, Jose Mongiardino by name, to carry the Bible into Peru. He had been laboring in Argentina, and had witnessed the triumphs of the Word in that republic. When he declared his intention of extending his work to Peru, he was warned of the dangers which would attend the undertaking. He was told that Roman Catholicism held no country so tightly in its fierce grip as it held Peru. The church was all powerful there, and the politicians who ruled the country were perfectly aware that they held their places by the sufferance of the priests, who could in every district secure the election of their nominees. The masses of the people were ignorant and superstitious, and there were multitudes of desperate and lawless men, ready to engage in any enterprise initiated or countenanced by the priests. Mongiardino was assured that he would never reach Peru, but would fall a victim by the way. With Apostolic ardor he answered as the first great missionary answered, "None by his success. The people received the Bible with avidity, and heartily welcomed him wherever he went. So much greater was his success than his anticipations, that his stock of Bibles, which he expected to carry into Peru, was exhausted before he could leave Sucre, and he turned back to Argentina to obtain a fresh supply. His work, however, had not escaped the notice of the priests. They were furious against him, and one high ecclesiastical functionary hazarded the safe prediction that Mongiardino would not live to reach Argentina again. The prediction was verified. Two emissaries of the church waylaid the brave colporteur, and his dead body was found on a lonely road near the frontier. As it has ever been in the history of the church, others volunteered to take up the work commenced by the dead. One and another set out on the perilous journey, but none could penetrate beyond Sucre, and they came back to tell of their perils and hair-breadth escapes. Finally patient, persevering, plodding worker, whose labors had been crowned with success on many a difficult field. One of his companions was Francis Penzotti, a young Italian carpenter, who had been won to the truth by Milne's labors, and was now his ardent follower and fellow-laborer.

REV. FRANCIS PENZOTTI.

The little party found that all that had been told them of priestly power and intolerance was true. It was impossible to remain. Their enemies had their grasp on the government and on the courts, and, at that time, death would have been the inevitable consequence of persistence. Following their Master's directions, they retreated, wisely avoiding the risks of travel, by making the return journey by sea. They had seen enough of the country, however, to satisfy them that if once they could obtain a footing in Peru, and carry on their work unmolested, much good might be done. The people were ready to receive the Gospel, and many of them were disgusted by priestly tyranny, and were looking eagerly for light. A little later, Penzotti and a colporteur made a second tour as secretly as possible. The earlier impressions were confirmed, and again the daring soldiers of Christ succeeded in escaping with their lives. A third expedition was afterward made by Milne and Penzotti, and this time, in addition to distributing Bibles, religious services were held. They circumnavigated the continent, and returned in safety.

Meanwhile, a change of conditions was developing in Peru, which had a remarkable result, showing how in God's providence evil may be overruled for good. A wave of unbelief swept over the country and the natural rebound from superstition and formalism came in agnosticism and infidelity. It might seem that unbelief was worse than Roman Catholicism, but its prevalence served the cause of truth. An anti-clerical party was formed which checked the of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto me." He set out, passing through Bolivia. He reached Sucre, the capital of that country, cheered and gratified a party of three set out, and to their great joy reached the Land of the Incas and unfurled the banner of the Cross. One of these was the Rev. Andrew M. Milne, a

A VISION OF HEAVEN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Text: Ezekiel 1: 1, "Now it came to pass as I was among the captives by the River of Chebar, that the heavens were opened and I saw a vision of God."

EXPATRIATED and in far exile on the banks of the River Chebar, an affluent of the Euphrates, sat Ezekiel. It was there he had an immortal dream, and it is given to us in the Holy Scriptures. He dreamed of Tyre and Egypt. He dreamed of Christ and the coming heaven. This exile seated by that river Chebar had a more wonderful dream than you or I ever have had, or ever will have, seated on the banks of the Hudson, or Alabama, or Oregon, or Thames, or Tiber, or Danube.

But we all have had memorable dreams, some of them when we were half asleep and half awake, so that we did not know whether they were born of shadow or sunlight; whether they were thoughts let loose and disarranged as in slumber, or the imagination of faculties awake.

Such a dream I had this morning. It was about half-past five, and the day was breaking. It was a dream of God; a dream of heaven. Ezekiel had his dream on the banks of the Chebar; I had my dream not far from the banks of the Hudson. The most of the stories of heaven were written many centuries ago, and they tell us how the place looked then, or how it will look centuries ahead. Would you not like to know how it looks now? That is what I am going to tell you. I was there this morning. I have just got back. How I got into that city of the sun I know not. Which of the twelve gates I entered is to me uncertain. But my first remembrance of the scene is that I stood on one of the main avenues, looking this way and that, lost in raptures, and the air so full of music and redolence, and laughter and light, that I knew not which street to take, when an angel of God accosted me and offered to show me the objects of greatest interest, and to conduct me from street to street, and from mansion to mansion, and from temple to temple, and from wall to wall. I said to the angel, "How long hast thou been in heaven?" and the answer came, "Thirty-two years according to the earthly calendar." There was a secret about this angel's name that was not given me, but from the tenderness, and sweetness, and affection, and interest taken in my walk through heaven, and more than all in the fact of thirty-two years' residence the number of years since she ascended, I think it was my mother. Old age, and decrepitude, and the tired look were all gone, but I think it was she. You see, I was only on a visit to the city, and had not yet taken up residence, and I could know only in part.

I looked in for a few moments at the great Temple. Our brilliant and lovely Scotch essayist, Mr. Drummond, says there is no church in heaven, but he did not look for it on the right street. Saint John was right when in his Patmosic vision, recorded in the third chapter of Revelation, he speaks of "The Temple of my God." I saw it this morning; the largest church I ever saw; as big as all the churches and cathedrals of the earth put together, and it was thronged. Oh, what a multitude! I had never seen so many people together. All the audiences of all the churches of all the earth put together would make a poor attendance compared with that assemblage. There was a fashion in attire and head-dress that immediately took my attention. The fashion was white. All in white, save One. And the head-dress was a garland of rose, and lily, and mignonne, mingled with green leaves culled from the Royal Gardens, and bound together with bands of gold.

And I saw some young men with a ring on the finger of the right hand, and said to my accompanying angel, "Why those rings on the fingers of the right hands?" and I was told that those who wore them were prodigal sons, and once fed swine in the wilderness, and lived on husks, but they came home, and the rejoicing Father said, "Put a ring on his hand."

But I said there was one exception to this fashion of white pervading all the auditorium and clear up through all the galleries. It was the attire of the One who presided in that immense Temple. The chiefest, the mightiest, the loveliest person in all the place. His cheeks seemed to be flushed with infinite beauty, and his forehead was a morning sky, and his lips were eloquence omnipotent. But his attire was of deep colors. They suggested the carnage through which he had passed, and I said to my attending angel, "What is that crimson robe that he wears?" and I was told, "They are dyed garments from Bozrah," and "He trod the wine-press alone."

Soon after I entered this temple they began to chant the celestial litany. It was unlike anything I had ever heard for sweetness or power, and I have heard the most of the great organs, and the most of the great oratorios. I said to my accompanying angel, "Who is that standing yonder with the harp?" and the answer was, "David!" And I said, "Who is that sounding that trumpet?" and the answer was "Gabriel!" And I said, "Who is that at the organ?" and the answer was, "Handel!" And the music rolled on till it came to a doxology extolling Christ himself, when all the worshippers, lower down and higher up, a thousand galleries of them, suddenly dropped on their knees and chanted, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." Under the overpowering harmony I fell back. I said, "Let us go. This is too much for mortal ears. I cannot bear the overwhelming symphony."

But I noticed as I was about to turn away that on the steps of the altar was something like the lachrymal, or tear-bottle, as I had seen it in the earthly museums, the lachrymals, or tear-bottles into which the Orientals used to weep their griefs and set them away as sacred. But this lachrymal, or tear-bottle, instead of earthenware as those the Orientals used, was lustrous and fiery with many splendors, and it was towering and of great capacity. And I said to my attending angel, "What is that great lachrymal, or tear-bottle, standing on the step of the altar?" and the angel said, "Why, do you not know? That is the bottle to which David the Psalmist referred in his fifty-sixth Psalm, when he said, 'Put thou my tears into Thy bottle.' It is full of tears from earth; tears of repentance; tears of bereavement; tears of joy; tears of many centuries." And then I saw how sacred to the sympathetic God are earthly sorrows.

As I was coming out of the Temple I saw all along the pictured walls there were shelves, and golden vials were being set up on all those shelves. And I said, "Why the setting-up of those vials at this time? They seem just now to have been filled," and the attending angel said, "The Week of Prayer all around the earth has just closed, and more supplications have been made than have been made for a long while, and these new vials, newly set up, are what the Bible speaks of as 'golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints.'" And I said to the accompanying angel, "Can it be possible that the prayers of earth are worthy of being kept in such heavenly shape?" "Why," said the angel, "there is nothing that so moves heaven as the prayers of earth, and they are set up in sight of these infinite multitudes, and, more than all, in the sight of Christ, and he cannot forget them, and they are before him world without end."

Then we came out, and as the Temple is always open, and some worship at one hour and others at other hours, we passed down the street amid the throngs coming to and going from the Great Temple. And we passed along through a street called Martyr Place, and we met there, or saw sitting at the windows, the souls of those who on earth went through fire and flood, and under sword and rack. We saw John Wickliffe, whose ashes were by decree of the Council of Constance thrown into the river; and Rogers, who bathed his hands in the fire as though it had been water; and Bishop Hooper, and McKail, and Latimer, and Ridley, and Polycarp, whom the flames refused to destroy as they bent outward till a spear did the work, and some of the Albigenses, and Huguenots, and consecrated Quakers who were slain for their religion. They had on them many scars, but their scars were illumined, and they had on their faces a look of especial triumph.

Then we passed along Song Row, and we met some of the old Gospel singers. "That is Isaac Watts," said my attendant. As we came up to him he asked me if the churches on earth were still singing the hymns he composed at the house of Lord and Lady Abney, to whom he paid a visit of thirty-six years, and I told him that many of the churches opened their Sabbath morning services with his old hymn, "Welcome, Sweet Day of Rest," and celebrated their Gospel triumphs with his hymn, "Salvation, O the Joyful Song," and often roused their devotions by his hymn, "Come we that Love the Lord."

While we were talking he introduced me to another of the song writers, and said, "This is Charles Wesley, who belonged on earth to a different church from mine, but we are all now members of the same Church, The Temple of God and the Lamb." And I told Charles Wesley that almost every Sabbath we sang one of his old hymns, "Arm of the Lord, Awake!" or, "Come, Let us Join our Friends Above;" or, "Love Divine, All Love Excelling." And while we were talking on that street called Song Row, Kirk White, the consumptive college student, now everlastingly well, came up, and we talked over his old Christmas hymn, "When Marshallled on the Nightly Plain." And William Cowper came up, now entirely recovered from his religious melancholy, and not looking as if he had ever in dementia attempted suicide, and we talked over the wide earthly celebrity and heavenly power of his old hymns, "When I can Read my Title Clear," and, "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood."

And there we met George W. Bethune, of wondrous Brooklyn pastorate, and I told him of how his comforting hymn had been sung at obsequies all around the world—"It is not Death to Die." And Toplady came up and asked about whether the Church was still making use of his old hymn, "Rock of Ages, Cleft for me." And we met also on Song Row, Newton, and Hastings, and Montgomery, and Horatio Bonar, and we heard floating from window to window snatches of the old hymns which they started on earth, and started never to die.

"But," say some of my hearers, "did you see anything of our friends in heaven?"

Oh yes, I did. "Did you see my children there?" says some one, "and are there any marks of their last sickness still upon them?" I did see them, but there was no pallor, no cough, no fever, no languor about them. They are all well, and ruddy, and songful, and bounding with eternal mirth. They told me to give their love to you; that they thought of you hour by hour, and that when they could be excused from the heavenly playgrounds they came down and hovered over you, and kissed your cheek and filled your dreams with their glad faces and that they would be at the gate to greet you when you ascended to be with them forever.

"But," say other voices, "did you see our glorified friends?" Yes, I saw them, and they are well in the land across which no pneumonias, or palsies, or dropsies, or typhoids ever sweep. The aroma blows over from orchards with trees bearing twelve manner of fruits, and gardens, compared with which Chatsworth is a desert. The climate is a mingling of an earthly June and October; the balm of the one and the tonic of the other. The social life in that realm where they are is superb and perfect. No controversies, or jealousies, or hates; but love, universal love, everlasting love. And they told me to tell you not to weep for them, for their happiness knows no bound, and it is only a question of time when you shall reign with them in the same palace, and join with them in the same exploration of planets, and the same tour of worlds.

But yonder in this assembly is an upturned face that seems to ask how about the ages of those in heaven. "Do my departed children remain children, or have they lost their childish vivacity? Do my departed parents remain aged, or have they lost the venerable out of their nature?" Well, from what I saw I think childhood had advanced to full maturity of faculty, retaining all the resilience of childhood, and that the aged had retreated to mid-life, freed from all decadence, but still retaining the charm of the venerable. In other words, it was fully developed and complete life of all souls, whether young or old.

Some one says, "Will you tell us what most impressed you in heaven?" I will. I was most impressed with the reversal of earthly conditions. I knew, of course, that there would be differences of attire and residence in heaven, for Paul had declared long ago that souls would then differ "as one star differeth from another," as Mars from Mercury, as Saturn from Jupiter. But at every step in my dream in heaven I was amazed to see that some who were expected to be high in heaven were low down, and some who were expected to be low down were high up. You thought, for instance, that those born of pious parentage, and of naturally good disposition, and of brilliant faculties, and of all styles of attractiveness, will move in the highest range of celestial splendor and pomp. No, no. I found the highest thrones, the brightest coronets, the richest mansions, were occupied by those who had reprobate father, or bad mother, and who inherited the twisted natures of ten generations of miscreants, and who had compressed in their body all depraved appetites, and all evil propensities, but they laid hold of God's arm, they cried for especial mercy, they conquered seven devils within and seventy devils without, and were washed in the blood of the Lamb, and by so much as their contest was terrific, and awful, and prolix, their victory was consummate and resplendent, and they have taken places immeasurably higher than those of good parentage, who could hardly help being good, because they had ten generations of preceding piety to aid them. The steps by which many have mounted to the highest places in heaven were made out of the cradles of a corrupt parentage. When I saw that, I said to my attending angel, "That is fair; that is right. The harder the struggle the more glorious the reward."

Then I pointed to one of the most colonnaded and grandly-domed residences in all the city, and said, "Who lives there?" and the answer was, "The widow who gave two res." "And who lives there?" and the answer was, "The penitent thief to whom Christ said, 'This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.'" And who lives there?" I said, and the answer was, "The blind beggar who prayed, 'Lord, that my eyes may be opened.'"

Some of those professors of religion who were famous on earth I asked about, but no one could tell me anything concerning them. Their names were not even in the City Directory of the New Jerusalem. The fact is that I suspected some of them had not got there at all. Many who had ten talents were living on the back streets of heaven, while many with one talent had residences fitting on the King's Park, and a back lane sloping to the River Clear as Crystal, and the highest nobility of heaven were guests at their table, and often the white robe of Him who "hath the moon under his feet," champed its bit at their door-way. Finite capsize of earthly conditions! All special life in heaven graded according to earthly struggle and usefulness as proportioned to talents given!

As I walked through those streets I appreciated for the first time what Paul said to Timothy: "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him." It surprised me beyond description that all the great of heaven were great sufferers. "Not all?" Yes, all. Moses, of the Red Sea a great sufferer. David, of Absalom's unfilial behavior and Hithophel's betrayal, and a nation's dereliction, a great sufferer. Ezekiel, him of the captivity, who had the dream on the banks of the Chebar, a great sufferer. Paul, him of the diseased eyes, and the Mediterranean shipwreck, and the Mares Hill prison, and the Mamerne endurment and the whipped back and the madman's ax on the road.

Ostia, a great sufferer. Sea, all the apostles after lives of suffering died by violence, beaten to death with fuller's club, or ragged to death by mobs, or from the thrust of sword, or by exposure on barren island, or by decapitation. All the high up in heaven great sufferers and women more than men, Felicitas, and St. Cecelia, and St. Agnes, and St. Agatha, and St. Lucia, and women never heard of outside their own neighborhood, queens of the needle, and the broom, and the scrubbing brush, and the wash-tub, and the dairy, rewarded according to how well they did their work, whether to set a tea-table or govern a nation, whether empress or milkmaid. I could not get over it as, in my dream I saw all this, and that some of the most unknown of earth were the most famous in heaven, and that many who seemed the greatest failures of earth were the greatest successes of heaven. And as we passed along one of the grandest boulevards of heaven, there approached us a group of persons so radiant in countenance and apparel I had to shade my eyes with both hands because I could not endure the lustre and I said: "Angel! do tell me who they are?" and the answer was: "These are they who came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb!"

My walk through the city explained a thousand things on earth that had been to me inexplicable. When I saw up there the superior delight and the superior heaven of many who had on earth had it hard with cancers, and bankruptcies, and persecutions, and trials of all sorts, I said, "God has equalized it all at last: excess of enchantment in heaven has more than made up for the deficits on earth."

"But," I said to my angelic escort, "I must go now. It is Sabbath morning on earth and I must preach to-day and be in my pulpit by half past ten o'clock. Good-bye," I said to the attending angel. "Thanks for what you have shown me. I know I have seen only in part, but I hope to return again, through the atoning mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ. Good-bye."

Then I passed on amid chariots of salvation, and along by conquerors' thrones, and amid pillared majesties, and by windows of agate, and under arches that had been hoisted for returned victors. And as I came toward the walls with the gates, the walls flashed upon me with emeralds, and sapphires and chrysoprases and amethysts, until I trembled under the glory, and then I heard a bolt shove, and a latch lift, and a gate swing, and they were all of pearl, and I passed out loaded with raptures, and down by worlds lower and lower, and lower still, until I came within sight of the city of my earthly residence, and until through the window of my earthly home the sun poured so strong upon my pillow that my eyelids felt it, and in bewilderment as to where I was, and what I had seen, I awoke.

Reflection the first: The superiority of our Heaven to all other heavens. The Scandinavian heaven: The departed are in everlasting battle, except as restored after being cut to pieces, they drink wine out of the skulls of their enemies. The Moslem heaven: As described by the Koran: "There shall be Houris with large black eyes like pearls hidden in their shells." The Slav's heaven: After death the soul hovers six weeks about the body, and then climbs a steep mountain, on the top of which is Paradise. The Tasmanian's heaven: A spear is placed by the dead, that they may have something to anything at the gate of heaven is the silver of tears. At the top of all heaven sits the greatest sufferer, Christ of the Bethlehem caravansary and of Pilate's Oyer and Terminer, and of the Calvarean assassination.

What he endured, oh, who can tell?
To save our souls from death and hell.

Oh, ye of the broken heart, and the disappointed ambition, and the shattered fortune, and the blighted life, take comfort from what I saw in my Sabbath morning dream.

Reflection the third and last: How desirable that we all get there! Start this moment with prayer and penitence and faith in Christ, who came from heaven to earth to take us from earth to heaven. Last summer, a year ago, I preached one Sabbath afternoon in Hyde Park, London, to a great multitude that no man could number. But I heard nothing from it until a few weeks ago, when Reverend Mr. Cook, who for twenty-two years has presided over that Hyde Park out-door meeting, told me that last winter going through a hospital in London he saw a dying man whose face brightened as he told him that his heart was changed that afternoon under my sermon in Hyde Park, and all was bright now at his departure from earth to heaven. Why may not the Lord bless this as well as that? Heaven as I dreamed about it, and as I read about it, is so benign a realm you cannot any of you afford to miss it. Oh, will it not be transcendently glorious after the struggle of this life is over to stand in that eternal safety. Samuel Rutherford, though they viciously fight with, and after awhile they go into a long chase for game of all sorts. The Tahitian's heaven: The departed are eaten up of the gods. The native African heaven: A land of shadows, and in speaking of the departed they say, all is done forever. The American aborigine's heaven: Happy hunting-grounds, to which the soul goes on a bridge of snake. The Philosopher's heaven: Made out of a thick fog, or an infinite don't-know. But hearken! and behold our Heaven, which, though mostly described by figures of speech in the Bible and by parable of a dream in this discourse, has for its chief characteristics, separation from all that is vile, absence from all that can discomfort: presence of all that can gratulate. No mountains to climb; no chasms to bridge; no night to illumine; no tears to wipe. Scandinavian heaven, Slav's heaven, Tasmanian heaven, Tahitian heaven, African heaven, aborigines' heaven, scattered into tameness and disgust by a glimpse of St. John's Heaven, of Paul's Heaven, of Christ's Heaven, of your Heaven, of my Heaven!

Reflection the second: You had better take patiently and cheerfully all pangs, affronts, hardships, persecutions and trials of earth since if rightly born they insure heavenly payments of ecstasy. Every twinge of physical distress, every lie told about you, every earthly subtraction if meekly borne, will be heavenly addition. If you want to amount to anything in heaven, and to move in its best society you must be "perfected through suffering." The only earthly currency worth burned his books and unjustly arrested him for treason, wrote of that celestial spectacle:

"The King there in his beauty,
Without a veil is seen;
It were a well-spent journey,
Though seven deaths lay between.
The Lamb with his fair army
Doth on Mount Zion stand,
And glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's land."

A CHINAMAN'S SELF-DENIAL.

Mr. Graham Brown, of the China Inland Mission, speaking at Glasgow, said: "A Chinaman of high rank in the army became a Christian. He was offered an appointment which would have brought him an income equal to ten thousand pounds a year in our money: it was the command of one of the divisions of the army that was about to occupy Turkestan. I do not know if this was his sole motive, but the reason he gave to me for not accepting it was, that if he went to Turkestan, he could not hear of Christ; and he feared that in that distant part of the land, cut off from all Christian communications, he would not be able to continue in the Christian course, so he sacrificed all, ambition and worldly prospects, that he might keep his soul safe. That man had always, even in his heathen days, been a seeker after truth. One day feeling that he could never hope to improve himself by the course he was then following, he left his room and stepped out into the street. About the first thing which he heard was a 'foreign devil' preaching Christ. He stopped, listened, and became interested. The more he listened, the more interested he became, until at length he concluded that this was the true doctrine for which he had sought so long, and he resolved to hold to it."

power of the priesthood and undermined its influence. Availing himself of the opportunity afforded by this crippling of his chief enemies, Penzotti returned. He was appointed agent of the American Bible Society and established himself at Callao, a suburb of Lima, the capital. After a few months, being unmolested, he opened a small hall where the services were held for the converts whom Penzotti gathered around him. His presence had not been unobserved by the priests and when he opened his hall they secured his arrest under a statute forbidding the holding of public services other than those of the Romish Church. The story of his imprisonment, which lasted over eight months, has already been told in this journal. Eventually, through the friendly offices of Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, and the protest of the Italian minister in Peru, Penzotti was released. He took a brief tour for the recuperation of his health, but was soon back again at Callao, where he is now, prosecuting his beloved work.

During his imprisonment the services in the little hall were not discontinued. Two of the converts ministered to the best of their ability to the little flock and prayer was made continually to God for the release of the beloved Pastor. Menacing words were chalked on the doors and walls of the hall threatening all who attended, with death, but they did not deter the people from coming. The number of converts grew and, as always happens in time of persecution, they were genuine men prepared to make sacrifices for their faith. Missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church went to Penzotti's aid and the work was extended.

Dr. Wood, who is at the head of that mission, says that now there is a genuine movement for freedom of religious worship which is growing in popular favor. A congregation has been gathered in Lima itself and five schools have been established for children. Two colporteurs are aiding in the work of Bible distribution and two Bible women are engaged in house to house visitation. Both the colporteurs and Bible women are converts of the mission and they are true and tried Christians. One of the colporteurs named Arancet was recently attacked by a murderous mob who dragged him away to stone him. Arancet knelt down in their midst and prayed for his would-be murderers. Provisionally the arrival of an officer prevented the commission of the crime. Luisa Hurtado, one of the Bible women, has been threatened with burning and has been reminded that it is not long ago that a priest in northern Peru caused a woman to be burned. But she and her fellow-laborer are fearlessly continuing their work.

The heroism of these devoted men and women is beyond all praise. Although they are aware that they are hated by the priests who are unscrupulous enough to incite the mob to do them a mischief, they shrink from no service which has a promise of usefulness. Dr. Wood says that the outlook is full of promise and every year adds to the force of the movement. The schools, especially, hold out a bright prospect. The children as they grow up will carry the Gospel influence with them into the home and will open the way to other avenues now closed. They belong to many nationalities. Beside the native Peruvians, there are children of European, Indian, African and Chinese parents. Two of the five schools are self-supporting and the others partially so. Eight of the teachers are natives who receive instruction in theology when not engaged in teaching. So much has come under the blessing of God on Penzotti's work.

The project of erecting a chapel in Callao as a memorial to Penzotti's brave stand for truth, is one reflecting great credit on the little band of Christian people. As they are poor, it will necessarily be a slow and arduous work, but should it take definite shape, they will doubtless receive encouragement and help from Christians in America and other lands, whose hearts cannot but be touched by their fidelity to Christ in the face of persecution.

GOD'S JUDGMENT ON SODOM.

S.S. Lesson for Feb. 18, Gen. 18:22-33. Golden Text, Gen. 18:25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD had once again, in Abraham, found a man that could understand him, a man who manifested, in the general tone of his life, that consideration for God which overruled all other consideration. With all reverence be it spoken, God had found among men a "friend." Jehoshaphat, in a prayer which God most manifestly answered, calls Israel "the seed of Abraham thy friend" (II. Chron. 20:7), and God does not reprove him. The Lord himself speaking by Isaiah, uses the same words, and James says: "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness, and he was called

The Friend of God."

God's purpose of uniting man to himself, although among the majority of the human race it was unknown, wilfully ignored, or rejected, yet found its accomplishment in the few, and received its development in increasing measure, where the seeming failure was the greatest. God had conquered Abraham, and now the man of God had, in heart, laid Ishmael upon the altar. There was no more hindrance to communion between God and his beloved servant. He appeared to him in the plains of Mamre and repeated his promise that Sarah should bear him a son. It was no longer difficult for Abraham to trust his God; only Sarah had now to be conquered. But God had another errand; having gained Abraham to his side about the manner in which he would fulfil his promise about his seed, he must proceed to bring Abraham to be of one mind with him about his judgments. There are few of God's children who enter into God's purpose in judgment with true understanding. We are so short-sighted, our natural sympathies go out so much more quickly to man than to God, until he can lead us to the point where we can say with Paul, and our life says it too: "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live, yet not I but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." He who declares gives something akin to his own foreknowledge as a kind of divine intuition from time to time to those who pay close attention to him, and they see the purpose he has in view in his judgments upon individuals, cities, kingdoms, etc.; they can see that the end he has in view is always consistent with the deepest love. "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" It is almost startling to think that God could speak so of a creature, and surely in the hearts of those who take pains to watch for, and reciprocate, every drawing near of God to them, there must arise an almost overwhelming consciousness of the dignity of our being as man, that even with one member of the human race God could be so intimate. Yet more, there may arise in such hearts an intense longing to know more intimately him whom to know is life eternal; a longing which is never left unsatisfied; it is heaven born, it has its origin and its consummation in God.

Abraham listened and God said: "Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous. I will go down now and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, and if not, I will know." God's commissions of inquiry are personally conducted. He cannot trust into other hands the passing of a sentence which must be executed during ages which God has not numbered, and which therefore man calls eternity, for time which we cannot measure is outside the scope of our human conceptions. It is an awful thing for sinners, for sinful lands, and for sinful cities, when God draws near to carry on a scrutiny from which no secret thought or motive can be concealed. Abraham trembled, and used his privilege as a friend to step in and intercede. But Abraham had, in his intercession, a hard lesson before him, the most bitter lesson which God's chosen instruments for evangelizing and teaching often have to learn—that he could not bring his spiritual children up to his own level. Probably Terah, Haran, Lot, Sarah, Hagar, Eleazer, and many, many others were led to know God through Abraham. But Lot, who was now dwelling in Sodom, had been blest, but was not made a blessing, and in his intercession, Abraham must know the truth about Lot.

Abraham drew near and said: "Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked. Peradventure there may be fifty righteous within the city," it would not be a very large number for Lot to win for God, "wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked: and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" It was almost a reproach, but God knew the heart loyal to him in its partial ignorance, and said: "If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sakes." Abraham was not satisfied: he may have put the number too high, and he carried his trouble to the Lord: "If there lack five?" Again Jehovah answered favorably. Abraham was emboldened: he again lowered the number "forty," then "thirty," then "twenty," always with the same result. Can he go farther? "O, let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak but this once: Peradventure ten shall be found there?"

It was an Awful Revelation to Abraham when the smoke of the country burnt up as the smoke of a furnace, and he knew that not even the family of Lot could be blest through him; not even ten righteous within the city. But his prayer was not lost; where God—for their own sakes, that their awful sin might not reach even greater proportions, and for the sake of the land, which was becoming contaminated by the men of Sodom, who were known as "wicked and sinners before the Lord exceedingly"—was obliged to execute judgment upon them and cleanse by fire the earth which they had defiled; God yet spared Lot.

Two of the three men who had appeared unto Abraham turned their faces and went toward Sodom. It was evening, and Lot entreated them to turn into his house for the night. Lot was not accustomed as Abraham was, to heavenly visitations. He was not at ease with the angels as Abraham had been, and they were not at ease with him; they must be constrained to enter his house. Lot sat in the gate, the place of honor, in Sodom. So long as he would live there without bringing God near to the wicked men of Sodom, they gave him honor. But when messengers from God entered in, persecution at once commenced. It is no light thing for a man who has known God, and then for years put business and earthly advantage before God and his glory, to turn round suddenly and seek to honor God. He does not know the strength of the chains which bind him until he attempts to break them. He tried to warn the men of Sodom, but they despised him, he had lost his influence, and he was as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law! The exodus of Lot from Sodom was a piteous, miserable thing! He had, for the sake of personal advantage, preferred such surroundings as he had in the wicked city, to the companionship of Abraham, when, if he had chosen to give away part of his flocks and herds, he might have conserved.

But riches became his master, and then his ruin, and when the heavenly messengers had delivered their terrible message, and Lot knew he was he never thought to intercede for others as Abraham had done. He had no faith for the men of Sodom, he did not pray even for his own household, but thought only of his miserable self. The angels said: "Escape for thy life, look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain, escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed." "O, not so, my Lord," was the almost despairing cry of the wretched man as he saw all that he had lived for slipping from his grasp. Lot got his way, but, as usual with such as seek their own, he was not satisfied, and at last fled to the mountain, having left behind him his reluctant wife and his property.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SODOM appears to have been situated on the southern borders of the Dead Sea. The theory was formerly disputed by scientific travelers, but Dr. Robinson and other careful explorers now believe that there are evidences that the Dead Sea was originally much smaller than it now is, and that its southern end covers the site of the cities. Traces of volcanic action are found in the neighborhood, which confirm the theory that Sodom perished much as Pompeii perished in the year 79 A. D., except that while Pompeii was smothered with ashes, Sodom was set on fire. The quantity of bitumen and asphaltum or slime-pits (Gen. 14:10), would account for the conflagration when the hot lava fell upon them. After the fire, there was probably an earthquake and a subsidence of the land over which the waters of the Dead Sea flowed, and added the territory permanently to the area of the sea. Sir J. W. Dawson, the Canadian geologist, thinks that the destruction may have been produced in another way. The bituminous country, he believes, would hold reservoirs of inflammable gas along with petroleum and water. "When these are penetrated as by a well, the gas escapes with explosive force, carrying the petroleum with it, and when both have been ignited, as by a flash of lightning, the petroleum rains down in burning showers and floats in flames over the ejected water, while a dense smoke towers high in the air." Through an eruption of this nature, which once happened in Canada, a space of fifteen acres was enveloped in fire and a village was burned. The air flowing toward the eruption caused a whirlwind, which carried the dense smoke high into the air and threw down burning bitumen all around.

The intercession of Abraham is worthy of careful study. At first sight Abraham is shocked at the idea of the righteous perishing with the wicked. The same thought has often occurred to people since, when in some great catastrophe like the wreck of a ship or as in the Johnstown flood good men perish with the wicked; yet few rest, as Abraham did, in his later thought, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Then comes his plea for mercy, rising higher as his faith in the divine goodness increases, until it halts while yet there is no sign of that goodness tailing. Thus we have in the narrative, the thought of God's patience before punishing; of God listening to intercession; and of forbearance being shown to evil men for the sake of a few good associates. Only ten righteous men in the whole city might have averted the punishment. It is the old idea of the remnant or, as Christ expressed it "the salt of the earth."

Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Assuredly he will. Rev. Mark Guy Pearse tells the story of a dream suggested by a conversation he had with a man who declared that the punishment of the impenitent was inconsistent with God's character. He says he dreamed that he passed through a city where the people stood in knots talking of a horrible outrage and murder. Then he passed the building where the judge was trying the prisoner, whose crime had stirred all the city. After a little he went out of the city, where under a shady tree a maiden of ten sat arranging a bunch of flowers. Presently a servant came and stood beside maiden, and, as his shadow fell over her said in a harsh voice, "Do you know what your father is going to do?" "No," said sunny maiden, with a smile, "what is going to do?" Then with a dark frown answered, "Going to hang that poor man that he tried in the court to-day." "Him?" she said, as the hands fell down her side and the sunshine died. "Yes, going to have the man killed." "My father never would," the child said indignantly. "You will see," sneered the servant, "heard them say it myself." The child went into the house saying, "My father is going to hang him? Poor man!" And when the judge came home to dinner he found a little daughter in tears. "Have you ordered the cruel executioner to hang that poor man?" she asked, and the judge said he had. Then the child would not kiss him. The judge took the little one on his knee and stroked her fair hair. "Do you not tell your father?" he said, and the child answered that she did. "You think I am kind and good?" The child assented. "Then," he said, "trust me still, and one day you will know."

I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord. When Abraham was so near the Given all good he might have used the opportunity to ask something for himself. But instead of doing so he pleads for others. Such men are always blessed. It is recorded that Oliver Cromwell while proceeding during his protectorate to some state ceremony, was approached by Fox. Cromwell was accustomed to denunciation and wondered what Fox would have to say to him. He fully expected to hear Fox abuse him; but it appeared that Fox had come to plead for some kindness to some poor Quakers. Oliver listened and finally took Fox to the palace. On paring the stern Protector said: "If thou and were but an hour of the day together, I should be nearer one to the other. I wish more harm to thee than I do to my own soul."

Of the same great statesman it is related that he never was attended by John Howe his chaplain, without Howe interceding with him for some one in trouble. Every one who wanted Cromwell to do something for them went to Howe and the clergyman presented their petitions. One day Cromwell said to him: "Mr. Howe you are always asking favors for some one or other and am constantly helping somebody at your request; why do you not ask for some favor for yourself? When will your turn come?" Howe modestly answered, "My Lord, my turn is always come when I can serve another."

I will speak yet but this once. God has given Abraham no reason to think he has reached the limit of concession. Abraham set his own limit. A writer in Revell's "Illustrator," relates that a Christian wife resolved to pray for her infidel husband every day at noon for eighteen months. At the end of that time she saw no change in him. But the limit she had set for herself could not confine her. She resolved to go on praying. Going to her room she said, "Lord, I will pray for him every day and at all hours as long as my life shall last." That day he was saved.

I will not destroy it for ten's sake. A city was actually saved from destruction once by the devotion of seven of its citizens. In the year 1346, King Edward III. of England besieged Calais in France. The garrison made a long defence, but were ultimately starved into surrender. Edward exasperated by the obstinate fight determined to put the whole city to the sword. The greatest concession that could be obtained from him, was that seven of the chief citizens of Calais should voluntarily offer themselves for execution. He would kill them and spare the others. Eustache de St. Pierre no sooner heard the terms, than he offered himself as one of the seven. Six other citizens offered themselves, and the little party bade adieu to their family and friends whose lives were to be saved by their death, and went to the English camp. Edward at once ordered them to be hanged; but the Queen, admiring their noble self-sacrifice, pleaded with her husband for them and they were set at liberty.

Abraham returned unto his place. He had gained all he asked having asked in faith. When David Gray the tuneful poet was asked how it was that he had so much confidence in his prayers being answered, he said simply that there was no wonder about it when two facts were taken into consideration. "Why are you surprised," he asked, "when God has love and I have faith?"

HELPING "THE LORD'S POOR."

"The Christian Herald Food Fund" Preparing to Start Relief Station No. 2—Gifts of Money and Clothing From Many States—A Glorious Work of Christ-like Charity.

VERY noble and generous have been the responses thus far received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to its appeal for the multitude of the deserving destitute in New York. During the past week, the Food Fund has been swelled by contributions from many states, and the total amount of the Fund is now $1,475. With the contributions there have come hundreds of letters of warm sympathy and cordial approval of the work itself, showing that the hearts of the senders are overflowing with compassion, and their ears ever open to the cry of the needy and distressed. While those who are able have given liberally, even the humblest have found something to spare for the starving mothers and children of the big city which in its own days of prosperity never failed to respond to the call for help from elsewhere. What New York gave to aid the fire, flood and ever sufferers in past years, Chicago, Boston, the West, the South and the Mississippi Valley are now repaying in their practical aid to the thousands of destitute, deserving families in New York, where enforced idleness has produced widespread want and misery. As the relief work has already expanded far beyond the limits originally contemplated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it has been decided to open another Relief Station, to operate in conjunction with "Relief Station No. 1," at 208 Eighth Avenue. "Relief Station No. 2," however, will be located on the East Side of town, in the most thickly populated tenement district to be found anywhere in New York. As at our Westside Relief Station, District Visitors will be employed to search out the really deserving poor, preference being given to Christian families who are in temporary affliction, in consequence of the want of work. As the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOOD FUND is now thoroughly systematized, in all its branches, no destitute family within the very extensive district now covered by the Fund, need go unaided. Our District Visitors have made a house-to-house visitation in the tenements of the Westside, coming in contact with the poor in their own homes and, by personal investigation, have located hundreds of worthy families, who are absolutely without means of support. In almost every instance, their condition has been such as to call for immediate relief. After a few inquiries, the District Visitor, being satisfied of the genuineness of the case, enters the name and address on her record book and within a few hours the Relief Wagon is at the door with food supplies. Should fuel and light be also needed (as is frequently the case) the Visitor gives out coal, wood and oil coupons, which are redeemable on presentation at the stores of the Fund at No. 208 Eighth Avenue. These coupons, which are printed together six on a sheet, like a railroad ticket, read thus:

THIS COAL IS FREE.

GOOD FOR 25 POUNDS OF COAL

EVERY DAY THIS WEEK AT

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD 208 and 210

RELIEF STATION No. 1, Eighth Ave.

IF CALLED FOR BETWEEN 9 AND 12 A.M.

BRING A BAG OR PAIL WITH YOU.

The coupons for oil and kindling-wood are similar to the foregoing. For these supplies, the applicant must call at the stores; but the food supplies are delivered by wagon, each family receiving enough to last an the household a week. Every needy fam-

Bread is supplied by the Food Fund fresh every morning, the allowance being one loaf for each person. A contract has been made with one of the largest baking-houses in New York City and the bread is sent direct to the Fund's stores on Eighth Avenue, where it is distributed to any members of the families who may call for it, only those on the Fund's lists, however, being supplied. Care is taken that the charity shall not be diverted from the really needy or that it shall become promiscuous. The distribution now exceeds 1,000 loaves a day. It would be a difficult task to convey to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and their friends an adequate idea of the beneficent results their generous support of the Food Fund and its work has thus far accomplished. Keeping steadily in view the principle that no worthy poor person should be overlooked, the managers of the Fund have endeavored, by personal investigation, to select as recipients of relief, such families as are in absolute want, giving the preference to those that give evidence of being worthy to be regarded as "The Lord's poor." There are thousands of such households on the East and West-sides of New York, where enforced idleness has been followed by want and sickness, and to these houses the District Visitors employed by the Food Fund come like angels of blessing.

unable to visit the Relief Station in person. This woman—a respectable widow—had had a pitiable struggle with cold and starvation for weeks. She had modestly asked for a little help and some underclothing for her children. The District Visitor, on trying to fit vests on the children, found they had absolutely no underclothing at all! Besides, their little feet were on the ground, protruding through the wretched apologies for shoes. They were fitted comfortably, and the bare cupboard was replenished on the arrival of the Relief Wagon.

In another house the visitor found a woman with five children, all very much in need of both food and underclothing. They were supplied with garments from the boxes sent on by contributors to the Fund.

In still another tenement home, a mother was found in the last stages of consumption. Her three children, and her unemployed and discouraged husband—now three months idle—sat around the woman, helpless and apparently dazed with cold and hunger. All credit had long since been refused at the grocer's, and an occasional scrap of food from some kindly neighbor had constituted their entire support for weeks. Clothing and a week's supply of food were furnished by the Fund.

Among the destitute homes visited by Mrs. Louis Klopsch, the wife of the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—who is actively aiding in the work of relief—was one of peculiar interest. On East Twenty-fourth Street, in a dingy tenement, she found a family that had been deserted by the wretched father. The mother and her baby were weak from long privation. Some pitying friends had given them a little food occasionally. The infant was supplied with some nice warm garments by Mrs. Klopsch, who has also undertaken the entire support of this family, among others similarly circumstanced.

Thus far, the relief work of the Food Fund has been signally blessed, and it now enters on a wider field of Christian usefulness, where, with the continued co-operation of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and their friends, it will be the means of ministering to the wants of still other hundreds of the deserving poor. Gifts of clothing and money to carry on the good work should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. As this edition goes to press, some dear friend in Mekinock, N. D., who prefers his name to remain unknown, sends his check for $200. "To buy food for the poor and keep hunger away, these cold winter days. Spend it where it will do the most good, and may God give his blessing," he adds fervently. Another writes that a barrel of corned beef is on the way, and still others send boxes of clothing. It is a work in which none should be unrepresented; and surely, when a dollar, as applied through the Food Fund, will feed a starving family for half a week, and a dime will buy four meals for a hungry man or woman, even the smallest offering in the way of help need not be despised.

CONCERNING AMUSEMENTS.

MANY people write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD inquiring whether indulgence in certain amusements is consistent with a Christian life. There are certain rules by which every person may decide for himself what is right and what is wrong in the way of amusements and recreations. Exhilarant and rebounding spirits are in most peril of going into dangerous amusements. The gayer the horse, the more important to have a stout driver; the swifter the ship, the more important to have a strong helmsman; and all these people who have rebounding and exuberant spirits ought to be very cautious, and discipline themselves into the right style of recreation and amusement. If you come from a place of amusement or recreation so nervous you cannot sleep, and you arise in the morning, not because you are slept out, but because your duty drags you from your pillow, you have been where you ought not. There are amusements that send one to the practical work of life bloodshot and yawning and stupid and nauseated. They are all bad—all that style of amusement. There are amusements that disgust one with the drudgery of everyday life—with tools of trade because they are not swords; with work-aprons because they are not robes; with the cattle because they are not infuriated bulls of the arena.

If any style of amusement gives you a longing for a life of romance and hair-breadth escapes, and love that takes poison and shoots itself, and makes you impractical in the great duties of life—those amusements ought to be obnoxious to you as they are obnoxious to God. Our recreations were intended to build us up, and if they pull us down in our moral or physical health, they are bad amusements.

Money spent for recreation is well spent. They that go into amusements they cannot afford, first borrow what they cannot earn, and then steal what they cannot borrow. First into embarrassment, then into lying, then into theft; and when a man gets as far as that he does not stop short of the penitentiary. There are thousands of men who have enough salary to support them and support their families, but have not enough salary to support their expensive amusements; and in that direction they perish.

Alas for the man who spends his life in laboriously doing nothing—the days in hunting for sport, the nights in seeking out some gas-lighted foolery! No time to pray, no time to work, no time to read. Always with the sporting-jacket on, hunting game in the mountain or fish in the brook—not half so well off the man as the greyhound that runs at his side, or the fly-bait with which he whips the stream.

Stand clear of all amusements which lead you into bad company, and all amusements that destroy domestic happiness. If you belong to an organization where you have to meet with the intertemperate, or the unclean, or the dishonest, or the abandoned, in God's name quit it—quit it. I never knew a man yet who could stand evil association and be unhurt—never one. If your duty leads you among bad men, God will take care of you. If your style of work day by day carries you among those who are bad, God knows that, and he will take you through the furnace, and you will be unscorched. But I mean, when a man deliberately chooses bad association because he likes it, that man has started on the road down. The association will despoil your soul.

LIFETIME COMPANIONSHIPS.

A WOMAN ought to be especially careful in her choice of life-companionship. She cannot afford to make a mistake. If a man err in his selection he can spend his evenings at the club, and dull his sensibilities by tobacco smoke; but woman has no club-room for refuge, and would find it difficult to habituate herself to cigars. If a woman make a bad job of marital selection, the probability is that nothing but a funeral can relieve it. Divorce cases in court may interest the public, but the love-letters of a married couple are poor reading, except for those who write them.

Avoid affiancing a despiser of the Christian religion, whatever else he may have or may not have. I do not say he must needs be a religious man, for Paul says the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife; but marriage with a man who hates the Christian religion will insure you a life of wretchedness. He will caricature your habit of kneeling in prayer. He will speak depreciatingly of Christ. He will wound all the most sacred feelings of your soul. He will put your home under the anathema of the Lord God Almighty. In addition to the anguish with which he will fill your life, there is great danger that he will despoil your hope of heaven, and make your marriage relation an infinite, an eternal disaster. If you have made such engagement, your first duty is to break it.

Further, do not unite in marriage with a man of bad habits in the idea of reforming him. If now, under the restraint of present acquaintance, he will not give up his bad habits, after he has won the prize you cannot expect him to do so. You might as well plant a violet in the face of a northeast storm with the idea of appeasing it. You might as well run a schooner alongside of a burning ship with the idea of saving the ship. The consequence will be, schooner and ship will be destroyed together.

The almshouse could tell the story of a hundred women who married men to reform them. If by twenty-five years of age a man has been grappled by intoxicants, he is under such headway that your attempt to stop him would be very much like running up the track with a wheelbarrow to stop an express train. Instead of marrying a man to reform him, let him reform first, and then give him time to see whether the reform is to be permanent. Let him understand if he cannot do without his bad habits for two years, he must do without you forever.

Avoid union with one supremely selfish, or so wound up in his occupation that he has no room for another. You occasionally find a man who spreads himself so widely over the path of life that there is no room for any one to walk beside him. He is not the one blade of a scissors incomplete without the other blade, but he is a chisel made to cut his way through life alone, or a file full of roughness, made to be drawn across society without any affinity for other files.

RELIGION A TONIC.

PRACTICAL religion is the friend of long life in the fact that it removes all corroding care about a future existence. Every man wants to know what is to become of him. If you get on board a rail-train, you want to know at what depot it is going to stop; if you get on board a ship, you want to know into what harbor it is going to run; if you should tell me you have no interest in what is to be your future destiny, I would in as polite way as I know how, tell you I did not believe you. Before I had this matter settled with reference to my future existence, the question almost worried me into ruined health. The anxieties men have upon this subject, if put together, would make a martyrdom. This is a state of awful unhealthiness. There are people who fret themselves to death for fear of dying. Take the tonic, the inspiration, the longevity of the truth. Religion is sunshine; that is healthy. Religion is fresh air and pure water; they are healthy. Religion is warmth; that is healthy. Ask all the doctors and they will tell you that a quiet conscience and pleasant anticipations are hygienic—perfect peace now and hereafter.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Reader, Detroit, Mich. Will you accept flour or potatoes, if sent for the starving poor of New York? If so, to whom must they be consigned?

All supplies for the destitute in New York should be forwarded to "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOOD FUND," Bible House, New York. Flour, potatoes, clothing, and money are needed.

W. M. Swallow, Gold Hill, Colo. Mrs. E. G. White, in her book entitled "Patriarchs and Prophets," in speaking of the serpents in the Garden of Eden, the medium that Satan employed to deceive Eve, says: "They had wings and were the most beautiful creatures on the earth, and while flying through the air presented an appearance of dazzling brightness, having the color and brilliancy of burnished gold." Where does she get the authority for such a statement?

There are many heathen legends, traditions and myths concerning the Fall, and she may have availed herself of some of them. There is, however, no authoritative account of the event, save that contained in the Bible itself.

G. H. Fielding, Fishersville, Va. 1. Is there any history of the world from the last date of the Bible to the time Christopher Columbus made his first effort to discover America? 2. Can God convert a man? We are taught that he is an all powerful Being and is able to do anything.

1. Josephus' "Antiquities," and "Wars of the Jews," and "Rollin's Ancient History," supplemented by "Lenormant's History," will fully cover the period indicated. 2. Yes; sacred and secular history are full of instances showing where the Almighty has chosen certain men to be his instruments. The conversion of Saul is one of the most notable cases in point. It certainly was brought about by no voluntary act on the part of Saul.

Nettie, Delta, O. 1. When do we know we have forgiven our enemies? 2. I saw a question in the Mail-Bag asking if it is right to give for charitable purposes and when asked about it, to deny it. Now, if one should say to you: "I know it was you who gave that, wasn't it," and you would say, "No," jokingly, thinking the person knew who it was, would it really be lying?

1. When we feel that the bitterness in our heart toward them has been replaced by love. Even though we may feel that they have merited punishment, we can still feel pity for them, and forgive them. As long as we feel that our enemy deserves humiliation at our hands, we have not forgiven him. 2. There are grades of lying and although the one you mention would be merely what is characterized as a "white lie," it would be a lie none the less, and an offence in the sight of God.

Subscriber, Powderly, Ky. We have prayer-meetings here every Sunday evening and have quite a large attendance and some very anxious souls? We find it difficult to express ourselves as Christians ought to. We have preaching only once a month. Can you suggest anything that would be helpful to us?

In many parts of the Union, there are sections that are remote from churches, and where the people are even worse off in respect to religious privileges than your neighborhood seems to be. In a number of such places where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is regularly received by some one, its sermons are read aloud to the assembled neighbors by some one in the gathering. We would recommend you to adopt this method, and also to encourage one another by taking turns in leading the exercises, in reading, praying, etc. When the tenuity of silence is shaken off, you will progress without much difficulty.

Subscriber, Ishpeming, Mich. 1. If a choir in the church is composed of worldly-minded people, is it proper that it should be continued? 2. Should any but the members of a church join in the singing of God's praises?

1. If the members of the choir permit their worldly-mindedness to interfere with the services or to impair their efficiency as singers, they should be discontinued and a well-behaved choir substituted. Criticisms of the choir are apt to be severe and unreasonable. It is unfortunate that every member of a church, whether in choir or pew, cannot be regarded as an exemplary Christian; but while the world and society remain as now, we must expect to find a few worldly-minded people even in the church. Suppose, instead of disbanding the choir, you make the effort, kindly and prayerfully, to improve it. 2. Even the meanest may have abundant cause for thankfulness and the heart's expression of gratitude and praise to the Great should not be forbidden. It would be well encourage rather than repress such feelings.

A. S. Terrill, Durham, Ill. Is there any creed in existence on which all denominations agree?

No we think not. The Apostles' creed probably is accepted by more than any other. As working platform, the Christian Endeavor Society's declaration is an excellent model.

J. W. Robinson, Caddo, Tex. 1. What is meant by the directions to leave the principles of the doctrine of Christ? 2. What nation crucified Christ—the Jews or the Romans?

1. That a Christian man should not be satisfied to have been accepted and justified, but should seek growth in grace and progress in the divine life. Justification should be the first step, not the end. 2. The Romans crucified Christ at the urgent and importunate demand of the Jews. It was not lawful for the Jews to put any man to death (John 8: 31), but Pilate did it to please them, lest they should complain to Caesar about some misdemeanors of his own.

B. F. Aurandt, Altoona, Pa., replying to "Harlem Subscriber," writes:

For my part I think it would be very convenient to have an Old Age and Emergency Fund laid by it we were living for self alone. But it one wishes to be true Christian, I think that the best way of determining such matters is to ask themselves what Christ would have been likely to do under like circumstances. I could not for the life of me imagine Him hoarding up money for such purposes, when his business was to go about doing good. "Subscriber" quotes: "Take no thought for the morrow." This should settle the matter of it all. And if Christ says "Take no thought for the morrow," how much less should we take thought for old age, which if it comes at all will come to most of us in 30 or 40 years hence. Then taking it into consideration that treasures laid up may take wings (as they often have done), in that case neither "Subscriber" nor the serving poor derive any benefit from them. Where, if the amount of either or both funds were put to relief of the poor, when it is badly needed, as a present, how much good would be done. What does it matter whether we die in the almshouse or not, if for the sake of Him who went about doing good, we do good with our means?

John Boughton, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

I assume that your Harlem subscriber is a Christian. If so the Bible teaching is readily accessible and safe and I hold that there are not to be any expediencies admitted in obeying Christ's teachings (Luke 6: 38 and 1 John 3: 17). He who is our Master made no mistakes and we shall be wise if we follow implicitly his teachings leaving all the consequences out of the question.

"Reader," New York, writing on the same subject, says:

The query as to the proper course for "Subscriber" to follow, is one which at this time especially ought to leave in our minds neither room for doubt or perplexity. Will not half, quarter, or even one-tenth of the amount he has, be acceptable to the Lord? When Christ said, "Take therefore no thought for the morrow," he did not mean to imply that we must necessarily leave ourselves penniless; but rather, he would have us watching, and attending to our duty, trust the Lord to give us grace sufficient for our trials and food sufficient for our temporal wants; and yet what says Paul the apostle, "I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may, also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus"; and is not the love of money, or rather the change of ownership, the one thing above all other a Christian endures?

A. H. Brayman, Vienna, Fairfax Co., Va., writes:

Noticing the suffering (as mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) among the poor and desiring to contribute my mite in the name of the Master, and in order that it may do as much good as possible, I will offer a barrel of potatoes C. O. D. to the highest bidder, the amount offered to be forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the relief of the destitute and suffering of God's people. The said barrel of potatoes shall be good, fair eatable potatoes.

P. Nicol, Unionville. One only of his books, The Way Out, has been published. Write to Anson F. D. Randolph, publisher, New York. Maggie B. Vernon, Charleston, S. C. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

SOUTH AFRICAN WARFARE.

REPORTS of the pacification of Matabeleland are sent by cable from the scene of the recent conflict. It would appear, although it is not explicitly stated, that the country will be included with Mashonaland in the British possessions in South Africa. Lobengula, the king of the country, had not been captured at the time the last dispatches were sent, but through his messengers an offer of terms for his surrender had been sent to him. The British authorities demanded his abdication, and in return promised him a renewal of his pension and a residence with land to be selected by him. It is thought that he will accept these terms unless his young braves, who are bitterly opposed to the British should compel him to reject them. It was they who forced him into the war against his better judgment and they still are beyond his control. The messengers by whom the offer of terms was sent brought the news that Lobengula deeply regretted the attack on Captain Wilson and his party, and that the King had executed summary vengeance on the brave who had incited him to the attack. On this page is a picture showing the methods adopted by the British forces of preparation for a battle. It represents what is called a Laager. It consists of a treble square formed of wagons, each of which is attached to its neighbor by the wheels. The wagons form a cover behind which the troops are drawn up. At each corner is an opening for ingress and egress and there the guns are planted. The position would not be a strong one against a civilized enemy, but is sufficient for such weapons as the Matabeles use. It may be hoped that the occupation of the country will lead to the advance of missionary operations. Having learned that the white man is capable of inflicting dire destruction, the Matabeles ought to learn that he is also able to show them the way of attaining eternal life. (Rom. 10: 14.)

The Sensitive Opal.

A jewellers' journal publishes a scientific article by a noted lapidary on the opal, which in part explains the superstitions which have been associated with the beautiful stone. He says: "There is probably no other stone so susceptible to outside influences as the opal. The stone is a soft stone, compared with other gems, and the flashing of its colors is due to the refraction of light on the tiny scales and almost invisible fissures within the stone, which acts like a prism, dividing the light and throwing out all the varying hues of the rainbow. The play of color is constantly changing. Dulness and brilliancy succeed each other with the regularity of atmospheric variations, moderate warmth having a distinct luminating effect, while much heat is capable of robbing the stone of all its beauty by drying the moisture contained in the minute cells. Many opals when set in rings lose their brilliancy through the wearers washing their hands with the opal ring on. It is a curious fact, too, that there are vapors emitted from the human body in certain diseased conditions that are capable of rendering the stone dull and opaque. And the fading of life and the fading of the opal may be simultaneous, but the stone is the innocent victim of the condition of the wearer, not the cause of the disaster." Thus, if the fading of the opal had been understood aright, the wearer instead of maligning it as a gem of ill omen, would have valued it for giving timely warning of the presence of disease. Many a Christian friend has been similarly maligned and cast off when he has uttered faithful warnings instead of flatteries. There are many people now, as there were in Isaiah's time, who say "to the seers see not; and to the prophets, prophecy not unto us right things; speak unto us smooth things." (Isa. 30: 9, 10.)

A Bird's Sagacity.

In an interesting article on the habits of birds, Mr. E. W. Nelson relates an experience he had in Alaska in an attempt to add a specimen of Aleutian terns to his natural history collection for the National Museum. He visited an island which the birds frequented and at length found a flock of them. He noticed one young bird which exactly suited his requirements. He fired at and missed it, and it flew wildly out to sea. There it was joined by an old bird, presumably its parent. Soon it grew tired and turned toward the shore, whereupon the old bird met it and forced it to turn back. Again and again—more than a dozen times—this manoeuvre was repeated, till the young bird was literally forced off to sea out of sight. Doubtless, the young bird thought, if it could think at all, that its parent was cruel in keeping it on the wing when it was tired; but the parent knew that it was better that niture was brought from her Southern home and was supplemented with articles in harmony with the house, which were purchased from New York dealers. No little time was given to the arranging of portieres and tapestries to make the house beautiful and home-like, and when all was finished the new owner moved in. Then unpleasant discoveries were made. Everything about the building that could be imitation was imitation. Much of the plumbing was false. The pipes did not go beyond the flooring of the rooms and, worse than all, the open fire-places could not be used, because the chimneys were mere ornaments, through which the smoke could not pass. The house was built for ornament, not for use. On consulting an architect, the owner learned that to make it habitable, would involve an outlay of several thousand dollars as a great part of it must be torn down and rebuilt. Her experience will be useful to her if she buys another house. She will not be likely again to assume that beauty is a guarantee of usefulness. The same assumption is unsafe in judging of character. Many a man who has charming manners, and is learned and cultured, is of little use in the world because he is unfit to be a habitation of the Holy Spirit. (II. Peter 2: 17-19.)

Let the Building Burn.

A dispute between two towns in New Jersey has involved a sad loss. Overtures were made some months ago by the citizens of West Orange to the authorities of Orange for an arrangement by which they

it. It would be well if every sinner who rejects the offer of salvation through Christ, when it is made to him, realized this fact. The emergency may soon come and he has no reason to count on God's magnanimity. (Heb. 10: 26, 27.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Gen. Neal Dow will be Ninety Years old on March 20. Miss Frances E. Willard is writing urgent appeals to his friends and admirers in this country to celebrate the event in some suitable manner.

A Successful Evangelistic Campaign has been conducted in the city of Marysville, Mo., by Major Cole. He had the cordial support of the Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian churches, and not only of the churches but of many business men, including the Mayor, who though not Christians themselves did all they could to make the meetings a success.

A Prisoner in a certain Penitentiary listened so attentively to the chaplain at the beginning of his term that the Chaplain took a special interest in him and presently with a Bible. He appeared to read it diligently during his imprisonment, but on the day before his discharge he took it back to the Chaplain saying that as he was going out he "should have no further use for it."

The American Bible Society Publishes a suggestive contrast in its monthly report. It is the fact that whereas a quarter of a century ago the traveler entering Rome was searched to see if he had a Bible or Testament on him and if either was found it was taken from him, the Methodists are now laying the foundations of a building that is to cost $100,000, and in it they will soon have three big power presses at work printing Bibles and Testaments by thousands.

Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, the Founder of the "Door of Hope," is doing a very excellent work among the outcasts in the New York slums. Mrs. Whittemore's book: Delia, the Blue-bird of Mulberry Bend, has awakened widespread interest in her slum work. Her touching story of Delia's rescue, conversion and death deserves to be read everywhere. The book can be had in paper at 50 cents, or cloth at 75 cents, by addressing the author at 102 E. 61 St., N. Y.

Major Whittle, assisted by Mr. George C. Stebbins, is holding revival meetings at Pawtucket and Central Falls, R. I. They commenced in the Congregational Church, but it is intended to hold them in other churches in turn.

The British Opium Commission has completed the Burmah inquiry as to the sale of opium in the country. A new regulation took effect on January 1, forbidding to Burmans the possession and sale of opium, but leaving the sale free to the Chinese and Shans.

According to the "Baptist Handbook of England and Wales," just published, there has been a very general growth. The membership has advanced from 337,499 to 342,507, the Sunday School scholars from 487,801 to 495,284, and the pastors in charge of churches from 1,855 to 1,881.

The Revival Services in Brooklyn are being carried on with increased interest. On Jan. 21, enormous audiences gathered in the Clinton Avenue Congregational Church and the Lafayette Presbyterian Church to hear Dr. Wharton of Baltimore, whose services in the Chicago campaign were greatly used of God for the conversion of souls. The daily services have been well attended and the after-meetings scenes of wonderful blessing.

Dr. L. W. Munball commenced meetings at Melton, Pa., on Jan. 25. On the day previous he left Bay City, Mich., amid such a scene as has rarely been witnessed. Three vast audiences assembled in the Presbyterian, Baptist and Congregational Churches, to each of which he delivered a farewell address.

He announced that he had secured the names of nearly 1,900 persons who had professed conversion, and he was certain that fully 2,000 had publicly confessed the Saviour, while 1,000 besides had expressed a determination to lead a better life. Of these, 544 had expressed a preference for the Methodist Church, 410 the Presbyterian, 300 the Baptist, 140 the Congregational and 257 scattering.

Dr. Chapman's Work at Saratoga, N. Y., entered on the second week with remarkable success. The Daily Saratogian describes the meetings on Jan. 14 as scenes of wonderful power. Early in the morning there was a prayer-meeting for men in the Grand Army Arcade. Then a meeting for men only, led by Mr. Elliott; a Bible Reading for women led by Mrs. Strain of Albany, and services in the various churches by the city ministers at which Dr. Chapman gave addresses. The after-meetings were crowded and many made profession of faith.

The Brooklyn Tabernacle Sunday School is doing its share in relieving the distress among the unemployed of that city. Each class is taking full care of some one poor family with the idea of looking after their every want from now until the warm weather sets in. Work is being procured for the unemployed, clothing and shoes are received and distributed through the agency of the Sunday School in the chapel of the church every afternoon and rents are being paid and recently even a funeral was conducted and the expenses of it defrayed by several members of the School.

Major Geo. A. Hilton's work at Pittsburg increased in power from week to week. At the close of the third week the "Leader" said: "Last Sunday there were 1,000 persons in the edifice in the evening. One hundred have already joined the congregation as a result of the revivals. Last Sunday night there were twenty-five conversions, to say nothing of the many who asked for prayers, so that the fourth week of the evangelistic work began with no lack of interest. The vast number of people that have attended the meetings since the beginning demonstrates that great interest has been aroused, and that the time was right for such a work."

THE WAR IN MATABELELAND—THE BRITISH SOUTH AFRICAN COMPANY'S TROOPS IN LAAGER.

its offspring should suffer weariness than incur danger in finding rest. Perhaps, some tried and troubled Christian, buffeted about by financial reverses, or domestic sorrow, or bodily sickness, may some day learn, that, like the young bird, his afflictions were necessary to keep him from rest that would be fatal to his spiritual life. (Heb. 12: 11.)

A House Owner's Disappointment.

The purchaser of a house in New York is seeking redress for an imposition on the part of a builder or vender. It appears that some months ago a lady of artistic tastes and some means came to the city from the South intending to build a house to suit her somewhat fastidious taste. While looking around for an eligible site she saw a new house which appeared to be exactly the dwelling that she desired. It was small, but exquisitely arranged and fitted up. The agent called it a bijou house, and in the lady's eyes it seemed a perfect little gem. There were pretty open fire-places in all the rooms and quaint little cupboards and cosy niches. The agent asked $35,000 for the house and the lady bought it at that price. Her fur-could have the services of the Fire Department of the latter town. The Orange people agreed to the proposal and undertook in consideration of a payment of fifteen hundred dollars a year to establish a sub-station at West Orange, and re-fit an old engine for use there. They proposed with the additional income to purchase a chemical engine for the joint service of the two towns. These terms did not seem to the West Orange people fair, so the negotiations were abandoned. On January 10, a large fire occurred and the Fire Department turned out and took an engine to the neighborhood where smoke and flame were rising skyward. A hydrant was found and the hose was being attached, when the discovery was made that the fire was on the West Orange side of the boundary line. This settled the matter as far as the firemen were concerned. The fire-extinguishing apparatus was not used and the building was allowed to burn. Whether the people thought there would be no fires, or that if there were, the Fire Department would be magnanimous and come to their rescue, they were mistaken. Having rejected its terms they have no ground for complaint against

THE CHURCH AND HER CRITICS.

A Sermon Preached last Sunday morning, Feb. 4th, by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Luke 6: 26, "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you."

THESE words were spoken by our Lord to his disciples. The Word of God teaches us that the people of God are so to live as to have a good reputation among the people of the world; but it also teaches us that if the children of God are faithful in their high calling, they will often be the subjects of severe criticism. It is their duty to rebuke evil wherever found. Only false prophets can always prophesy smooth things. We should, indeed, desire to have the good opinion of the wise and the good; but we should also be willing to bear reproach for the sake of Christ and his truth. The church of Christ is, therefore, to expect criticism. She must not shrink from it; indeed, she cannot help challenging it. She is a city set on a hill. The church does not fear criticism; she fears nothing but error and sin. Truth seeks the light, comes to the light, rejoices in the light. Error loves darkness, grows in darkness, and reluctantly comes into the light, which at once reveals and rebukes its deformity. A true Christianity knows that correct knowledge, and not ignorance, is the mother of genuine devotion. A true Christianity welcomes truth from whatever quarter it comes and by whatever messenger it is brought. A true Christianity cares more for truth than for the opinions of the greatest men; she says evermore, as Jesus said to those who asked, "Master, where dwellest thou?" and as Philip said to Nathanael, who thought no good thing could come out of Nazareth, "come and see." She submits all her premises, processes and conclusions to the full sunlight of the most critical examination. She has absolutely nothing to conceal.

In the encaustic tiling at the entrance to one of his homes, Lord Tennyson, we are told, had the words, "Truth against the world." A true Christianity will write these words at the head of every sermon, on the first page of every book, and on the heart of every disciple. In this spirit the church ought to go forth to meet her critics. Criticism is the act or art of judging; the judgment is not necessarily unfavorable. But even when unfavorable, the church, as the child and champion of truth, will go forward fearlessly and even joyfully to meet it. Consider, first, the Church and her Early Heathen Critics.

I do not call them atheistic critics. It is doubtful whether such a phenomenon as an intellectual atheist ever existed; but practical atheists are, and always have been, very common. There are men who live as if there were no God. Could it be authoritatively announced to-morrow that God is dead, they would make no change in their systems of thought or in their methods of life. To them there is no God. Such persons were known to and characterized long ago by the psalmist when he said, "the fool hath said in his heart, no God." It was a fool who uttered the words, and even he said them in his heart rather than in his head; for the head of even a fool knew better. Atheism of whatever kind is a freezing void, an arctic breath, a lifeless life. It is an atmosphere in which no wing can soar, no heart can beat and no soul rejoice. Atheism can transform a rare day in June into a raw day in January.

Atheistic, or more strictly, polytheistic, critics of Christ and the church appeared early in the history of Christianity. They fiercely attacked the church; they created great consternation. No doubt many pious souls thought the ark of God was in danger; and yet most of these critics would now be unknown were it not that Christian writers have perpetuated their names in the books written to oppose their sophistical arguments.

Lucian first comes before us. He was born at Samosata on the Euphrates about the year 120, and he died about the end of the second century. He was placed with his maternal uncle, who was a sculptor, that he might learn statuary. Later we find him practising law at the bar in Syria and Greece; then as a teacher of rhetoric in Gaul, where he gained pupils and fame; then he appears in Athens as the boon companion of the gay, wealthy and impious circles. There he wrote much, his writings consisting mostly of attacks on philosophy and religion. Toward the latter part of his life he held a lucrative office in Egypt, bestowed upon him by the Emperor Commodus. He has been called the "Voltaire of Grecian literature." He wrote in the form of dialogue and in pure and elegant Greek. His keen wit did good by opposing the quackery of heathen priests, and the shallowness of philosophical charlatans; but he attacked Christianity in common with the false systems of heathenism. He spoke of Jesus Christ as a "crucified sophist," and not as an impostor, as did Celsus. Christianity he treated with a compassionate smile and not with a bitter sneer. He was marked by a general unbelief, was an Epicurean, a worldling, and a fine example, as has been said of the "nil-admirari school."

A Pioneer Critic.

Next comes Celsus. His history is involved in obscurity, but he was born probably early in the second century. His vulgar jibes and ribald criticisms remind us of Thomas Paine of a much later day. He is the reputed author of the work entitled, "A True Discourse," which was written against Judaism and Christianity. We would know almost nothing of his writings were it not for Origen who, though he knew little of Celsus himself, wrote vigorously against his methods and conclusions. In so doing he quoted many parts of his opponent's arguments, and thus has sent them down to succeeding generations. It is almost certain that Celsus was a Platonist, and quite certain that he was a man of much philosophical learning and of equal critical ability. He discovered and declared many of the objections to Christianity which its ablest opponents mention and emphasize to-day. In several important matters he anticipated the theories of Mr. Darwin. Strictly speaking, he was not an atheist; he believed in a supreme God. He believed in original uncreated matter as the source of all evil; but he denied a supernatural will and final aims or courses. There was nothing but involution and evolution of reason and matter. These principles, if they had triumphed, would have been fatal to Christianity.

Origen, more to please friends than to satisfy himself, replied to Celsus in the book entitled "Contra Celsum;" and he has thus preserved his opponent's name. Only as men link their names with the deathless name of Jesus Christ, do their own names become immortal. The names of the three men who were cast into the fiery furnace abide; the names of the mighty men who cast them in are unknown; they were never recorded. The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance, but the memory of the wicked shall rot.

A Philosophical Foe.

Then came the brilliant Porphyry, whose original name was Malchus, the Greek form of the Syro-Phœnician word Melek or King. The word Porphyry is an allusion to the colors of which regal robes generally consisted. He was born at Tyre about the year 233. He was truly a celebrated heathen philosopher; an able expounder of neo-platonism, and a bitter opponent of Christianity. He was without doubt one of the most brilliant and sagacious, one of the most determined and persistent critics Christianity has ever had during all the centuries of its existence. He stands vastly higher in character and ability than either Lucian or Celsus. They were comparatively rude; he was refined and personally noble. They were coarse jesters; he was a philosophical thinker. They attempted to check the progress of Christianity, he determined utterly to destroy Christianity. They gave Christianity a sneer or a syllogism; he sought to give Christianity its death-blow. He was scholarly and able at every point; he was a peerless heathen polemic. Perhaps it is not too much to say that Christianity never had a more relentless and capable foe. He moved boldly into the arena; he was resolved to dethrone Jesus Christ. He made a tremendous onset against the supernatural in Christianity, endeavoring to disprove the records in which the gospel is taught; this method of opposition he devised. Lucian and Celsus did not attack the gospel records. He anticipated, perhaps he suggested, methods which are common in our own day. About the year 270 in Sicily, having gone there after a fit of deep melancholy during which he attempted to take his own life, he wrote fifteen books against Christianity. He might as well have attempted to climb to the sky and blow out the sun. He simply succeeded in making his name hated by Christians far and near. Thirty defenders leaped into the arena to do battle for Christ and his truth. Jesus Christ, not Porphyry, is King. He wears the royal purple and the crown of glory and bears

The Palm of Victory.

We now come to one of the most interesting and accomplished of the earlier writers of the Church, Julian the Apostate. His full name was Flavius Claudius Julianus. He was born in Constantinople in the year 331. He was the son of Julius Constantius, and the nephew of Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor on the throne of the Cæsars. He, too, made a vigorous but ineffectual attempt to destroy Christianity and to establish the Græco-Roman heathenism in power and splendor. It has been said that the Arian Christianity of Constantius, his cousin, produced the anti-Christianity of Julian. He was the last great champion of a dying polytheism. It ought to be remembered also that the heathenism with which he was in love, was idealized by philosophy and purified by Christianity. The culture of that old Hellenic world had for him an irresistible charm; and in giving his love to its culture, he gave also his loyalty to its religion. Christianity was to him almost synonymous with family cruelty. We can all somewhat sympathize with the mitigating circumstances in his case of which Neander speaks. Brilliant and able, though he was, he was ready to believe the most absurd legends of the gods. He apostatized as early as 351, but for purposes of political ambition he concealed for years his real sentiments. In 361 he became emperor. He forbade the Christians to teach or be taught rhetoric, so that their ignorance might weaken their power; he even forbade the use of the name Christian. When his soldiers came to receive gifts they were obliged to throw a handful of incense on the pagan altar. Three times he assisted the Jews in their foolish attempts to rebuild Jerusalem, in order to falsify the predictions of Christ. He, however, showed great ability as a soldier, as he had already showed aptitude as a scholar. But all his efforts to destroy Christianity were in vain; paganism was dying; in Christianity alone all the hopes of humanity were centred. Finally, he found himself, after many brave exploits, in a waterless and desolate country at the hottest season of the year, surrounded by the whole Persian army; an arrow sped through the air; and in a moment more he lay on the ground mortally wounded, June 26th, 363. A later tradition says, that taking up a handful of sand saturated with his own blood, he cast it into the air, exclaiming: "O, Galilee, thou hast conquered." Thank God, the Galilee will conquer every foe!

Attention must be directed, in the second place, to some of the Scientific Critics.

To a true science no Christian teacher can object, and established truth of science is as much a truth, in its place and for its purpose, as any statement of revelation. All true discoveries of science are revelations of the thought of God. Every truth of mathematics is to be honored as fully in its place as a truth of revelation. This thought gives honor and glory to the study of sines and co-sines of angles and triangles. Many Christians have made most unfortunate opposition to scientific discoveries; all such discoveries are to be honored as revelations of the eternal mind. It is only to a science falsely so-called that we object; truth is one and the revelation of God in science cannot contradict the revelation of God in Scripture. Genesis and Geology, rightly interpreted, must teach the same great principles. There may be contradictions between our interpretations of God's book of nature and our interpretations of his book of revelations; but the contradictions are in our interpretations and not in the divine revelations. There are scientific critics who are opposed to Christ and his cause; to the church and Christianity. But, for the most part, they are men who have not profoundly studied either the history or the principles of our holy religion; they have been occupied largely, if not exclusively, with their own scientific investigations.

Darwin

is a melancholy example of men of this class. At one time he was broad in his investigations and varied in his attainments; but he devoted himself so exclusively to his specialties that he became narrow and painfully bigoted. He himself tells us that a page of Shakespeare "nauseated" him, and that music gave him exquisite pain rather than pleasure. To use a word which has become common in certain scientific treatises, many of his nobler faculties became atrophied. There was much in Darwin to admire; he was a man of marvelous industry, of great honesty, and of singular devotion to his studies. But he developed his nature unsymmetrically; and he became narrow instead of broad. This remark applies in part to Spencer, Huxley, and many others of this class. On the other hand, there are scientists who are as famous for their devotion to Christ and their loyalty to the Bible as they were conspicuous for scientific learning, and as they are honored by brother scientists throughout the world. The celebrated Agassiz belongs to this class. He was the son of a Protestant minister, and he studied medical and other sciences at Zurich, Heidelberg and Munich. His first work was a Latin description of the fishes which Martius and Spix brought from Brazil; while visiting in Paris he formed an intimate friendship with Cuvier and Humboldt. In 1848 he accepted a call to the chair of geology at Harvard. He became widely known for his rejection of the Darwinian theory.

Christian Champions.

With the exception of Hugh Miller, no one did more to help science in our day than did Agassiz; perhaps no other introduced and trained so many young and enthusiastic naturalists. Whipple was right when he said of Agassiz: "He was not only a scientific thinker but a scientific force." Similar honor is due to Guyot who honored his native country, Switzerland, and his adopted country, America, alike by his great learning and noble character. He gave honor to Princeton College and to the world of learning on both sides of the Atlantic. Professor Gray was to Harvard College what Guyot was to Princeton and more; he also gave honor to America, and to science throughout the world. His name reflects credit upon Christianity as Christianity illumined and ennobled his life. The illustrious Dana was to Yale College what Gray was to Harvard. His name was a synonym for scholarly attainments and for Christian faith. Perhaps the celebrated Dawson is in many respects more illustrious than any scientist already named. Recently he was knighted as an expression of royal appreciation. He gives honor to Canada, to America, to Britain and to the world. These men are remarkable witnesses for Christ and Christianity, and they are as eminent in science as they were loyal in faith. Jesus Christ is King; his throne is in the centre of the great realm of truth; the whole earth is his footstool; it is the incarnation of his thoughts. All chemical forces are revelations of the mind of God; the flowers are God's beautiful thoughts; the mountains his majestic thoughts; the stars his brilliant thoughts. The best student of nature, other things being equal, is he who is most loyal to Jesus Christ, as the God of creation and as the King of truth. No one can be truly loyal to the teachings of nature, as revealed by science, if he is disloyal to the world's Creator and Preserver.

The Literary Critics.

in the third place, also deserve consideration. The two classes sometimes intermingled; but still there is a distinction to be made. There are men who are supposed to be lights in the literary world who are against Christ and Christianity. But, for the most part, they are lights of but little brilliancy; they are but tallow dips or gas lamps compared to the great electric lights, the suns of literature. Who are the great lights of literature? Glance over the centuries; pronounce the names of Homer, Euripides, ocrates, Plato, Virgil and a dozen more. You say that these men are heathen; you are quite right. But they were religious according to their light; they caught inspiration from their religion; indeed, this religious element in them gave them power; it made their writings immortal. Rob their works of this religious element and you rob them of the characteristics which have given them enduring fame. Pronounce the names of the great authors in English literature. Such names as Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, Shakespeare, all the Puritan Divines, and such as Addison, Carlyle, Ruskin, Browning, Tennyson and others; differing much among themselves in religious faith, still these men were inspired by religious hope and constrained by divine love. George Eliot never reached her highest possibilities; agnosticism limited her attainments; this world bounded her horizon. Tennyson and Browning, each on his own lofty peak of Parnassus, looked across the valley of the Muses to the other with admiration and affection. They were apostles of purity and of power; they were disciples of truth and Christ.

Champions of this Generation.

It is cause for profoundest congratulation that the greatest minds and the sweetest voices across the Atlantic during the closing years of this century, sang to the praise and glory of Jesus Christ, Son of man and Son of God. Pronounce some of our great American authors; such names as Bryant, Cooper, Emerson, Holmes, Lowell, Longfellow, Motley, Whittier, and a dozen others. These men differed among themselves touching many matters of faith; but they lived and wrote under the inspiration of Jesus Christ. Pronounce if you can the names of a dozen or so infidels on either side of the Atlantic, who can be for a single moment compared to these writers for intellectual attainment, not to speak of their moral character. Christianity gave us the greatest of poets, John Milton; the greatest of lawyers, Blackstone; and the greatest of politicians, Gladstone. Christianity develops intellectual power and immortalizes native genius. The men of greatest brain, of vastest learning and of most brilliant genius, are found bowing low at the feet of the Christ. The giants have had their day against Christianity, and have utterly failed. Do you think that the pygmies are to do what the giants have failed to accomplish? Do you think that a few poets and novelists are to overthrow the kingdom of God? Do you think a woman's novel, which has for its hero a man who never took a regular course in theology, a man more ignorant of the history of theological questions—according to the author's showing—than a middle man of average attainments in an average theological seminary, a man who excites our pity and justifies our contempt; a man who topples over when confronted with the questions which were answered at least 1500 years before he was born; do you think this novel is to overthrow the Church of the living God? Shades of Lucian, of Celsus, of Porphyry and of Julian is this the fate that befalls you? Climb to yonder moon and draw a curtain over her fair face; climb to yonder sun and blow out its light with your feeble breath—these things you may do as soon as you can put out the light of Jesus Christ, the Sun of righteousness, or darken the glory of the Church, which is "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners." Let us stand with Jesus Christ; let us lean on the Rock of Ages; let us glory in the Bible. Pantheism, atheism, every ungodly ism shall go down. But the Word of God and the Christ of God and the Church of God shall stand forever!

A SAMOAN CONVERT'S PRAYER.

The prayer of Teava, a convert of the Hervey Islands, who helped to carry the gospel to the natives of the Samoan group, would do well for any missionary setting forth on his good errand, although the man who offered the prayer had been only nine years before the lowest kind of a heathen; "O Lord, thou art the King of our spirits, thou hast issued orders to thy subjects to do a great work. Thou hast commanded them to preach the gospel to every creature. We are going on that errand now. Let thy presence go with us to persevere in the great work until we die." Even those who stay at home may be better for reading over extracts from such a prayer, especially those who may think that cannibals are scarcely worth saving.

THE SHINING SHORE.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

WHEN youth and vigor droop away,
And hopes and aims are gone,
When night appears at close of day,
And earthly scenes are flown,—
Then may they look through loving eyes,
And trust in him who bore
Their sins while here, that they might rise
To that fair, shining shore.

The aged ones whose three-score years
And ten are drawing nigh,
Can have no doubts within nor fears,
For Christ is standing by;
"I am the Way," he saith to them,
"For you the Cross I bore;
Look to the Star of Bethlehem,
That shines on yonder shore."

Ah! yes, they're gone, those faithful friends,
We loved to meet while here;—
The angel of the Lord attends
Them in that happy sphere;
They'll circle round the dazzling throne,
And praise forevermore,
And shine as they had never shone,
Safe on the heavenly shore.

WATCH FOR SOULS.

WATCH for souls, for men are dying
They are hurrying to the grave,
Without thought about their future,
Or the Christ that came to save.

Watch for souls my brother, sister—
Live for him who died for thee, Warn the sinner, point the anxious
To the tomb of Calvary.

Watch for souls. Yea, watch for Jesus
Till the watching time is o'er,
Till we go to be with Jesus
Where we shall go out no more.

THE ROCK.

LEAD me to the Rock, that is higher than I,
To thee O my Saviour, my God I would fly.
When my heart is downcast, with sorrow and woe,
For help and for comfort, to thee I would go.

Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I,
When storms of adversity darken my sky,
To find 'neath its shadow, a shelter from ill,
And prove how my God, doth his promise fulfil.

Lead me to the Rock, that is higher than I,
When the dear ones I love, are passing on high. [and the dark,
My lone saddened soul, through the mist
Would fly to the rock, as the dove to the Ark.

Lead me to the Rock, that is higher than I,
Hide me in its cleft, till life's trials are by.
O Saviour, the Rock on which all my hopes rest,

I lay my tired head on thy Infinite breast.

THE MILLENNIAL KINGDOM.

What is Revealed in the Bible about the Saviour's Reign on Earth.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE.

THE Lord Christ, as the Son of man, is to reign here; on this ransomed and regenerated earth; for a thousand years in glory, as its King.
It is written: "The Lord shall give to him the throne of his father

David." "The government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called, Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Father of the future age, the Prince of Peace. Mighty shall be his dominion, and of his peace no end. He shall ascend the throne of David." "At that time they shall call Jerusalem the Throne of the Lord; and all nations shall be gathered to it, to the name of the Lord to Jerusalem." Luke 1: 32;
Is. 9: 6, 7; 24: 23; Jer. 3: 17; Zech. 8: 3, etc.

At the beginning of this millennial reign the earth is cleared of its ungodly inhabitants.
"Thus shall it be at the consummation of this present age. The Son of man shall send forth his angels and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that cause stumbling and them that do iniquity." None of the rebellious and ungodly are left. Matt. 13:
40-42, 49, 50; 25: 41, 46.

At the beginning of this millennial reign God's covenant with Israel is revived; they are gathered from all nations; reunited; and settled again in prosperity and power within their own land. And this land is to be henceforth the centre of the world's religion and its empire. (Jer. 31: 8-15; Isa. 11: 11-16; 12: 6; 60: 1-21; Ezek. 36: 22-35.)

During this millennial reign all the nations shall be taught of God; and he will pour his spirit upon all flesh. (Isa. 2: 2-4; 66: 23; 11: 9.)

During this millennial reign man's great enemy is chained and imprisoned. Men shall not be tempted by him, nor the nations seduced. In this present dispensation,
"We wrestle not against flesh and blood alone, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the Heavenly places." (Eph. 6: 12.)
But then, in that coming age, "that old Serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, is bound with a great chain, and cast into the bottomless pit and shut up there, and a seal set upon him that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be finished" (Rev. 20: 1-3).

Then is to be the reign of peace;—"His name shall be the Prince of Peace." "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more."
"But they shall sit every man under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid, for the mouth of the Lord of Hosts hath spoken it." (Is. 9: 6; 2: 4; Micah 4: 3, 4.)

Then is the discord of creation to end:—
"The wolf shall dwell with the lamb and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the young lion and the fatling together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the suckling child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand in the adder's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord." (Is. 11: 6-9; comp. Hosea 2: 18-23.)

Then, too, is the earth's fertility to be restored:—"I will open rivers on the bare heights, and fountains in the midst of the valleys. I will make the wilderness a pool of water and the dry land springs of water.
I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the acacia, the myrtle, and the oil-tree; I will set in the desert the fir-tree, the pine and the box-tree together; that they may see and know and consider and understand together that the Hand of the Lord hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it."
(Is. 11: 41, 18-20; Ezek. 34: 27, 29; Ps. 75: 12.)

And then also is to be lengthened to its first duration the life of man:—"I will rejoice in Jerusalem and joy in my people; and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. There shall be no more one born prematurely, nor an old man that hath not filled his days; for the youth shall be an hundred years of age."
(Is. 65: 19-22.)

It is into this Millennial Kingdom the Lord Christ welcomes as many from the living nations as have been able, to abide the judgment of the King. He tells them that they have been long cherished in the mind and heart of God; that they are blessed of his Father; that their deeds have been in this last sifting age approved by him; that it is for them, as its citizens, this Kingdom and this new dispensation have been designed.

THE DENOMINATIONS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 18, John 17:21; Luke 9:49,50; I Cor. 1:12,13.

FOR what does our denomination stand? That is the question proposed for consideration this week by the Christian Endeavor Committee. How various the answers will be, may be seen by consulting the list of churches which have Christian Endeavor societies. But the answer should not be a partial one. The peculiarity of each denomination does not represent all that the denomination stands for. It may be the distinction which separates it from other denominations; but it stands for other, and generally more important, matters. For example, the Baptist Church stands for the baptism by immersion of believers only; but it stands for other things, too. Like the Presbyterian, the Congregationalist and many other churches it stands for justification by faith, for sanctification by the Holy Spirit and the cardinal evangelical doctrines. This fact should never be forgotten. There is always a danger of laying too much stress on the minute peculiarity and forgetting the basic truths in which the church has fellowship with other churches. The practical result of the habit is to restrict the fellowship, which ought to be broad and extensive. To refuse to recognize as a brother a man who accepts nineteen out of the twenty articles of our creed, but rejects the twentieth, is to miss the true idea of Christian unity. While it is natural and proper that we should prefer to worship and associate with persons who agree with us as to rites and ceremonies and church government, the preference ought not to debar us from association with others who do not agree with us in those matters, but are one with us in loyalty to Christ. The essential unity of all who own Christ as their King, who are serving him and propagating his kingdom in the world, should never be overshadowed by non-essential divisions. The field is one, the enemy is the same. One is our Master, even Christ and his people should be one in heart and spirit. The war of the sects has been waged long enough. Their time has been spent in quarreling and disputing with each other; it is time now that the weapons that have done deadly mischief on the brethren should be turned against the common enemy. The sin and misery and ignorance and oppression and cruelty in the world should be assailed by a united church. The settlement of vexed questions of doctrine, polity and ceremonial may well be adjourned while so much practical work remains to be done. We have long been loyal to our creeds; let us now try being loyal to Christ. Every one who loves him and is serving him should be enrolled under his banner; mutual jealousies should be laid aside and every Christian count every other Christian as his comrade in the conflict. Therefore the answer to the Committee's question, for what does our denomination stand? should be first of all, Loyalty to Christ.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN ENGLAND.

All denominations are adopting the Christian Endeavor movement in England, and as here they are finding it a source of blessing and helpfulness. In the course of a report of the progress of the movement which Rev. W. Bainbridge of Chester, sends to headquarters, two testimonies are given by distinguished ministers. Dr. Clifford, the eminent Baptist minister, says: "Christian Endeavor societies are growing rapidly amongst Baptists. No other organization combines so many attractive and necessary features. It gives a primary place to the cultivation of the devout life. Prayer and consecration are first, and always first. Personal effort is indispensable. The formation of habits of active sympathy and evangelical usefulness is encouraged. The corporate life of the Christian brotherhood is nourished. Indeed, it is felt to be the one thing needful to counteract the dissipating influences that abound on every hand in this pleasure-loving age, to evoke sympathy with the church and its institutions, and to promote a robust and useful piety." The Rev. E. C. Gauge, another powerful London Baptist preacher, who succeeded Rev. F. B. Meyer, at Regent's Park Church, speaking recently, said, "I have tried many methods for getting hold of the young people,—cricket clubs, literary societies, debating classes,—but have never found anything which so readily took fire, and brought so much blessing, as the Christian Endeavor. I have gone to their prayer meetings and sat down among them; they have done all the managing, and my witness is that not even at the table of the Lord have I enjoyed sweeter fellowship than when thus associating with about one hundred young people." The Baptists are leading the van in England, having at present the largest number of societies.

FOREIGN C. E. LEADERS.

One of the strongest testimonies to the value of the Christian Endeavor movement

REV. TASUKE HARADA.
(President of the C. E. Society of Japan.)

is the unanimity with which it has been welcomed and adopted by Christian people in lands radically unlike our own and each other. The portraits on this page are of men who illustrate this fact. One of them is President of the Union in New South Wales and the other President of the Union in Japan.

Rev. W. J. L. Closs is a Scotchman by birth, but has spent his life from infancy in the Australian colony. His parents moved thither thirty-four years ago, and after some wanderings settled in New Zealand. With the characteristic love of the Scotch for education their son was sent to the best school in the colony and was well-drilled at home. On attaining majority Mr. Closs was competent to teach, and was appointed master of an important school at Dunedin. His call to the work of the ministry, however, was unmistakable and he yielded prompt obedience. After a theological course at Camden College, Sydney, he settled at Mount Eden, near Auckland, where he held a successful pastorate for two years. At the end of that time he accepted an invitation from the Summer Hill Church near Sydney, where he still is. He was one of the first pastors in New South Wales to organize a Christian Endeavor Society, and when a United Society was formed for the Colony he was elected President. During his year of office the Society trebled its numbers and at its close he was re-elected for a second term.

Tasuke Harada, the President of the United Society of Japan, although not yet thirty years old, is a man of mark in his native land. He is pastor of the Bancho Congregational Church, the largest church in the Capital. Mr. Harada is a man of strong convictions and decisive action. He belongs by birth to the nobility, but with a profound belief in democratic principles, he several years ago deliberately renounced his hereditary privileges to become a commoner. After his conversion to Christianity, he entered the Doshisha University in Kyoto, from which he graduated with honors. His first pastorate was at Hiogo where he labored for seven years. During this period he organized a Congregational Church in the great northern Island of Yezo. Recently he came to this country and took a divinity course at New Haven. At its close he went to Europe, visiting the great universities of England and Germany, and made the acquaintance of eminent scholars and preachers. On his return to Japan, Mr. Harada was urged to become a Professor in the University, but preferring preaching and pastoral work, he declined and accepted the invitation of the Bancho Church in which he is doing successful work. He has strong faith in Christian Endeavor principles and is the best man in Japan for the position he occupies, as President of the United Society.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A cordial invitation has been sent to the Young Men's Christian Association through the world to attend the general Jubilee Conference in London. It is signed by Mr. George Williams, the President of the British National Council and reads as follows: "The thirteenth International Conference and Jubilee Celebration of Young Men's Christian Associations will, through the kindness of the various National Unions who have accepted our invitation, take place in London, from June 1 to 7, 1894. On behalf of the Jubilee Council, I desire to express to you the great joy we have in the anticipation of welcoming your delegates in our midst. I invite your prayers, and those of the members of the Associations generally in the various countries, that the auspicious and important occasion may, through Divine blessing, be characterized by great spiritual power, and lead to a wide extension of the work of Young Men's Christian Associations throughout the world." Instructions are also sent as to the rights and powers of delegates. Every country may send one voting delegate for every five associations and will have, besides delegates, representing the National Committee, in proportion to the numbers of its associations—five if the number is below a hundred and ten if it is above a hundred. The Cunard Company has agreed to carry delegates at $135 for the round trip. It will be necessary to sail on or before May 19. Secretaries who know of any of their members intending to be present at the Convention are requested to send their names with those of the delegates to Mr. George A. Hall, at the Y. M. C. A., New York.

INTERDENOMINATIONAL UNION.

It seems impossible to keep the Young People's Societies from association with each other. In spite of the efforts of the ministers and leaders to keep them in separate flocks under their own control with the fences high and in good repair, the young people are so well aware of the advantages of association with others of other denominations who are working for the same object and in the same spirit, that they are organizing alliances their own account. A typical instance occurred at Ravenswood, Ill. A correspondent of the "Epworth Herald" reports that there are in that city "a Methodist Epworth League, a Congregationalist Endeavor Society, a Baptist Union, and a Unit Presbyterian Christian Union. Each is successful. But the young people desired come into closer sympathy and co-operation. A union meeting was called. It proved regular fellowship meeting. Then an alliance was formed, with a president and secretary. Monthly meetings will be held at different churches to study methods of Christian work and plan for the salvation of the young people of the community. Whether this movement will have the approval of Dr. Schell and Dr. Wilkins, we shall probably soon hear, but to the ordinary observer it would seem as if such an alliance would be effective in promoting Christian brotherhood and influencing the young people in the city who are at present outside the church.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Valjejo, Cal., has opened a reading room at that port for the benefit of sailors.

Dr. Schell, the General Secretary of the Epworth League has removed to Berwyn near Chicago, where personal letters to him should now be addressed.

The Leipzig Young Men's Christian Association has received from the King of Belgium an expression of his best wishes for the prosperity of its work.

Bishop Fitzgerald, before leaving on his tour, signed a number of blank commissions for officers of the Epworth Guards so that each officer might have the Bishop's autograph on his commission.

In the New York Christian Endeavor Union there are English, German, Italian, Hungarian, colored, floating and police societies, and it is the expectation that a French society also will soon be added.

A good example is set by the B. Y. P. U. of Des Moines, Iowa. It asks secretaries in other cities who know of young people going to Des Moines to live, to report to the Union so that they may be welcomed to the city.

Arrangements for the reception of the International Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union at Toronto next July have already been commenced. The Massey Music Hall in which the Convention will hold its meetings is now in course of construction. It is located at the corner of Shuter and Victoria Streets, in the heart of the city. It is the gift of Mr. H. A. Massey, a wealthy citizen of Toronto.

The Epworth League of Nostrand Avenue Church, Brooklyn, is one of the largest Leagues in the world, having a membership of about 450. Prayer and praise services are held every Sabbath evening. Many of the members also assist in sustaining mission services in the neighborhood, and at the Deaconess' Home. A subscription of $1,100 to the New Sunday School building has been paid by the League to the trustees.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Cleveland, O., has issued two pieces of ribbon to every member. One of the pieces is maroon and the other white. Each member was requested to wear them in his button-hole and salute every man whom he saw wearing them. The object was to make the members acquainted with each other.

The Mercy and Help Department of the Epworth League of Summerfield Church, Baltimore, Md., has appealed to the citizens for contributions of provisions to continue the free meals it is giving to the poor of the city. There has been a generous response.

Young Men's Christian Associations in Europe are meeting various kinds of fortune. The work of the associations of Austria is carried on under very adverse conditions, and the secretary at Noiselay reports that the branch there is strenuously opposed. In Norway, on the other hand, the work flourishes, and one after another the associations are entering suitably equipped premises. Good work is being done amongst soldiers in Switzerland.

In Ancient Philistia.

The People of Gaza and their Customs and Traditions—Decay of a Great City.

CLUSTER of villages, the largest of which lies on the top of a low hill, while the others are on the plain beneath; the houses mean-looking mud-hovels, and the streets narrow has survived of and filthy—this is all that the once powerful city of Gaza, the pride of the ancient Philistines. Ghuzzeh, as the modern town is called, has probably about thirteen thousand inhabitants, and lies on the great thoroughfare between the head of the Persian Gulf and Hebron. The hill itself appears to be mainly composed of the piled-up ruins of a succession of cities that have stood there, and the debris of massive walls and fragments of columns tell the story of Gaza's departed greatness. Once a strongly fortified city, it has now no walls or defenses and even its inhabitants seem to have retrograded, for they are generally regarded as fierce and lawless, especially in their attitude toward strangers. The illustration on this page represents a family group of Gazites of the better class. Living in an almost tropical climate, where palm-trees, olive-groves, and fruits of many different varieties flourish, and where corn and other cereals grow with slight cultivation, the problem of support becomes a very simple one. So plentiful is the corn crop of Gaza that it is remarked by travelers that the sound of the mill-stones is heard there all day long. It has a few really good bazaars, but its merchants are rapacious. Still, to travelers and caravans both going to and coming from Egypt, a stop at Gaza is indispensable. Here a new stock of provisions and necessities is secured for the journey through the desert, and the water-skins and bottles are filled from the cool, deep wells.

It was probably long before the time of Abraham that the Avim, who were the original inhabitants of the border of Canaan, were conquered by the Philistines. Those Avim were half-nomads, living alternately on the plains and the neighboring desert. Gaza, in after days, was one of the five great Philistine cities which each gave a golden emerald as a trespass-offering to the Lord. It is memorable also as the scene of Samson's exploit, when he took the doors of the city gate and the posts and carried them on his shoulders to the top of a hill near Hebron. His tragic death in the temple of Dagon, in whose wreck he involved "all the lords of the Philistines," is also a part of the history of this strange, old-world town lying amid its ruins on the edge of the Egyptian desert.

Like most other large cities of the East, Gaza has suffered from the various wars that have been waged during the passing centuries. Half a dozen times destroyed and rebuilt, it seems to have maintained its importance until it fell under Moslem domination. The blight of Islamism, which withers whatever it touches, has reduced it to its present dilapidated condition.

A Californian Paradise.

A Santa Barbara, Cal., reader, sends us the following letter: "In reading Marion Harland's description in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of a 'Syrian Paradise,' I hoped that no one would feel that he must cross both ocean and continent to reach one, our beautiful boulevard, the sunset hues are on the waters and the surrounding mountains and distant islands are robed in purple and mist, one might verily imagine that 'the gates of Paradise here swing ajar.'

"I wish your correspondent could take a trip to California when she returns from the far East, and she can sit out on the piazza in January to write in the sunshine, as I am now doing, listening to the song of birds in the live-oak trees, watching the lights and shadows on the mountains, and catching glimpses of the sea beyond."

A "Conundrum Social."

Here is a good recipe for a pleasant evening among the young folks and their juvenile friends at home: Write out on small strips of paper all the good conundrums you can find, carefully numbering each one, 1, 2, 3, 4, etc. You will need from thirty-five to fifty conundrums. The slips of paper are to be pinned around in different places in the house where the social is to be held. Pin them on table covers, window curtains, portieres, drapes, and in different rooms, and at a height easy to read without removing them. Give to the guests pencils and paper, and announce the total number of conundrums they are to find. Search and study begin at once. At an appointed hour all must gather in one place and listen to the correct answers read by someone, each per-cheeks grow rosy, and his eyes dance with exhilaration. If the baby is given some kind of an outing, the risk of his catching cold will be small.

HELP ME TO LIVE.

LORD, help thou me to live above
The trifles in this life:
To fill my days with works of love—
Lord, lead me through the strife!

When I would wander off in sin,
Restrain me for his sake;
Thy holy paths, oh, keep me in,
Nor let me e'er forsake.

And when I've run my race below,
And let me run it well!
On me eternal life bestow,
That I with thee may dwell.

SOCIAL CUSTOMS IMPROVING.

THE manners and customs of society are improving, writes Dr. Talmage. This is going to be a better world to live in. Take it all in all, it has vastly improved. I know that there are people who long for the good old times. They say, "Just think of the pride of people at this day!" "Just look at the ladies' hats!" Why, there is nothing in the ladies' hats of to-day to equal the coal-scuttle hats a hundred years ago. They say, "Just look at the way people dress their hair!" Why, the extremest style of to-day will never equal the top-knots which our great-grandmothers rolled up with high combs that we would have thought would have made our great-grandfathers die with laughter. The hair was lifted into a pyramid a foot high. On the top of that tower lay a rosebud. Shoes of bespangled white kid and heels two or three inches high. Grandfather went out to meet her on the floor with coat of sky-blue silk and vest of white satin, embroidered with gold lace, lace ruffles and hair in a queue. Oh, you modern hairdressers, stand aghast at the locks of our ancestry! The great George Washington had his horse's hoofs blackened when about to appear on a parade, and writes to Europe ordering sent for the use of himself and family one silver-laced hat, one pair of silver shoe-buckles, a coat made of fashionable silk, one pair of gold sleeve-buttons, six pairs of kid gloves, one dozen most fashionable cambric handkerchiefs, besides ruffles and tucker. Talk of dissipating parties of to-day and keeping of late hours. Why, did they not have their bees and sausage-stuffings and tea-parties and dances, that for heartiness and uproar truly eclipsed all the waltzes, lancers, and redows and breakdowns of the nineteenth century? And as to old-time courtships! Washington Irving describes them. I once said to my father, an aged man: "Are people so much worse now than they used to be?" He made no answer for a minute, for the old people do not like to confess much to the boys. But after awhile his eye twinkled and he said, "Well De Witt, the fact is that people were never any better than they ought to be."

when here in our own land, her descriptions of luxuriant vegetation would equally apply. As I look out of my window in Santa Barbara, I see a poinsettia spreading its broad disks of scarlet in the open lawn on a shrub nearly nine feet in height and close beside it a scarlet passion-vine climbs to the top of a eucalyptus, fully seventy feet high, making the whole tree aflame with its gorgeous beauty. Here, too, are orange trees, laden with their golden fruit, tangerines, mandarines, and lemons, and the roses—the roses grow rankly in every garden; jasmine and ivy drape the stone walls enclosing the lawns; fuchsias climb in at the second-story windows, violets and pansies abound, and hedges of geranium are too common to mention. We look out upon the smiling Pacific: palms, peppers and pines wave in the soft ocean breeze, and when driving on Child Hygiene in Winter.

One of the first rules to be observed in preventing colds in children is to give them plenty of fresh air, even in the colder weather. Dress them warmly and give them air. Of course judgment must be used if the child is not constitutionally strong. Dress him as if going into the street, or wrap him warmly in a shawl and take him into an upper chamber where one window is open. You can carry him briskly up and down in this fresh, clear atmosphere, avoiding draughts, and the little fellow's lungs will be filled with pure air, while his pulse will bound, his Happy Girlhood.

Be girls while you may. Womanhood with all its privileges and power, its burdens and trials, will come soon enough. Let womanhood come to you. The responsibilities of life will come soon enough. When they come you will meet them, I trust, as true women should. But, oh, do not be so unwise as to throw away your girlhood. Rob not yourself of this beautiful season, which wisely spent will brighten all your future life.

SYNOPSIS OF EARLIER CHAPTERS.

The first scene of the story is a week-evening service in the Jeremy Taylor Memorial Church, Brooklyn. The pastor, Rev. William C. Barnes and his wife notice among the strangers present, a lady whose features seem to Mrs. Barnes strangely familiar. She cannot identify her, but, later, as she is sitting at her own window, she sees the same lady pass and recognizes her as Mrs. Alice Paull, an old schoolfellow. She raises the window and calls "Alice, Alice," but there is no reply. Alice Paull, was Alice Lanier, when Mrs. Barnes went to school with her, the daughter of the wealthy Mr. Lanier, who is now dead and his business is in the hands of the son, Mr. Roger Lanier. Mrs. Paull's brother, Her husband, Ernest Paull, whom she married eighteen years before the opening of the story, was an idle, pleasure-loving man, whose neglect and unkindness she had patiently borne. He had lost several business positions and ultimately had embezzled the money of his employers and absconded. He confessed his crime in a letter to his wife's brother, who carried the news to Mrs. Paull. Shocked by the intelligence, she goes out at night, not telling her daughter Marie, or her Scotch servant, Elspeth, where she is going. Wandering aimlessly around, she turns into the church, where Mrs. Barnes sees her. On her return to her home she falls sick of brain fever. Her physician, Dr. Bacon, engages a good Christian woman, Mrs. Williams by name, to nurse her. In conversation with Mr. Roger Lanier, Mrs. Williams admits that she, too, is a deserted wife, and Mr. Lanier is impelled by her sympathy to tell her the story of Mrs. Paull, his sister.

CHAPTER VII Continued.

"Do you think so?" said the nurse, looking at the reverse side of the clipping as if hoping there to discover whether or not the criticism were correct. "Now, I was hoping that he had studied the lesson out for himself, and found it so useful that he couldn't help but recommend it to us who had been tried and tempted and had suffered in the same way. It reads to me like, 'O, taste and see!'"

She read the extract over again silently to herself, before resuming her talk.

"I know lots of people who have learned to live by the day, and even hour. But his minute business is spandy new to me. And it does seem to me to fit in splendid with the hairs-of-your-head, and the falling-sparrow and the grass-of-the-field and the young-ravens-when-they-cry doctrine."

"But nobody takes such figures of speech literally. It would be childish to pretend to live in that way in a practical age. An intelligent man or woman must plan, and provide for—and dread—the unknown future. With at least one-half of those who know the uncertainties and terrors of life, it is a fearful looking forward—a fearful looking forward!"

The scorn was sadder, the intonations desolate. She moved uneasily among her pillows. The probe had found the ball. Mrs. Williams had assisted at too many operations not to understand what the flinch meant.

"That fearful looking-forward is a part of the doom of the impenitent," she said, quietly. "When the beloved of the Lord are permitted to look ahead, they are commanded to lift their heads and look up. That's the only use they have for far-sighted eyes."

"I will lift up my eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help."

"Look unto Me and be ye saved."

"From Genesis to Revelations it is 'Up! up! It's the only safe and sensible thing to do when you're traveling in dizzy places, whether its with our bodily feet or in spirit. The dear Lord blindfolds us when the road is very dangerous, then lays tight hold of our hands, and his voice—not behind us, but close beside us, oh, so close, and so sweet!—saying: 'This is the way! Walk ye in it! And I will lead them in paths they have not known.' The sheep know his voice and ask nothing better than to follow him. I would be the foolish thing in nature to try to pull off the bandage. Yet that is what the best of us are apt to do."

The conversation was stayed at that for a long while. Mrs. Williams took up her knitting, a shawl of cream-white Saxony wool, intended, although nobody but herself knew this, for a Christmas present to Mrs. Paull. Her needles did not click, and the fluffy fabric harmonized with her personality in some mysterious way.

"I don't think I took in the full meaning of what you said just now," came at last from her companion. "Existence would be a tame affair if all order their thoughts according to your rule. We might as well have been born short-sighted in soul and mind."

"'T would have been more comfortable, if this was all the life we are to have. My eyes are uncommon strong for a woman of fifty-three, but a year ago this month something or other ailed 'em. When I'd hold a book or my work down this way, I'd see a shadow of a line just above the real one. 'T was a sort of double sight, and it bothered me no end. So I went to an okkerlist. My pastor gave me a letter to him. He flashed a flight way down to the bottom of my eye-balls and went thought all manner of tests with 'em, and then, says he—'what have you been doing to strain your optic muscle?' Have you been reading in bed, or anything like that when you weren't in your usual health?"

"So I had to confess that, being laid up for a couple of weeks with influenza, I had read in bed the whole enduring time, seeing I so seldom get a chance to indulge myself that way, and being awful fond of books. He said when I did that, the angle of vision wasn't right. So I paid for my foolishness and ignorance by being unable to wear civilized peoples' glasses, but must have a pair ground slanting-like to suit the sight I'd twisted from the uprightness in which the Almighty had created it. Now, 't seems to me that's about what we do when we go against God's law of spiritual sight. He gives us one day at a time, and tells to make the best of it. And we are continually peeping 'round, or under, or over it, in a fease to see what's coming next, at an angle he never intended us to use. It's no wonder we get cross-eyed and what not, and lose our clear views of life, and can't see heaven straight without we have gospel glasses, ground expressly to suit what we've made ourselves to be."

Mrs. Paull looked unaffectedly amused, yet thoughtful.

"Still you say there are people who have trained themselves not to look beyond the day. How do they begin the work?"

"By receiving the kingdom of heaven and all belonging to it as little children. When God says a thing, they just simply believe it. That's the whole secret. They believe it as babies believe in their mothers,—take him at his word as Gladys takes all you say for gospel truth. If you were to say to her in a thunder-storm,—'Mamma will keep you safe, dear,' she'd not have another fear."

"Yes! because she sees and hears me. We have no guarantee that God has any especial message for the individual human soul. I am still in the dark as to the first lesson of your faith and practice. Where do you get your certified orders?"

"He says, 'When ye pray, say our Father who art in heaven,' and so on. When you get to 'give us this day'—or as the new Version puts it in the margin, 'day by day our daily bread,'—stop and ask yourself if he hasn't some merciful reason for repeating that 'daily' idea so often. It is a kind of fence he has built about to-day."

"You've got nothing to do with what is going on outside, he says to you by that form of prayer: 'To-day is your business, and there's enough to do to keep you busy. To-morrow belongs to me.'"

"I've got a piece of poetry at home, I'll have copied off for you sometime, if you don't mind, that says how 'from the coming ages' we must 'reverent take the virgin day.' That's the idea! A new day, a clean day,—something made just purposely for each of us, that nobody has even had in all eternity past until this very morning; something to be improved and enjoyed with all our heart, soul and strength, before it is sealed up and laid away with all the yesterday that have been since creation, and labeled along with God's eternal years."

She wrought industriously at the creamy shawl, knitting one needle out and another in, then looked up, smilingly:

"I shall never forget when I first got hold of that beautiful idea, and what a lovely thing the fresh day seemed to me. Not a thumb-mark, not a spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. I saw a thousand pleasant things to be happy for, and to wonder at, as the hours went by, that I would have missed if I have been thinking about what might happen to-morrow, and knowing it's all I am sure of, I make so much more of little things," unmindful, in her enthusiasm, of the change in her tenses. "By bed-time, when you come to say your prayers"—mixing up persons in like happy confusion—"you are actually afraid of wearying the Lord, if that could be (which it isn't!) with your thanksgivings. And, when you lay your head upon your pillow, you fall asleep like a well baby in its mother's arms. That day is done with—shut and wrapped up carefully and put into God's safe hands."

"Nevertheless I should think you would find life monotonous,—a very tame affair, as I said just now. Just the same story over and over and over to the end of time. The hope that to-morrow may bring a change in their condition is all that keeps miserable people from despair."

"You would swap hope off for faith. I'd better say, perhaps, you would run the two into one grace. 'What man has done, man may do again,' is a saying that people find no difficulty in believing. What God has done in the way of goodness and mercy, God will do again, and keep on doing to all eternity. If he took care of me all day yesterday and every other yesterday I have ever lived and forgave my sins and granted me the joy of his countenance, and healed my sorrows, and strengthened me to do his holy will—he's bound to do as much for me to-day. Why, it's for to-day he promises strength and grace, and our Saviour positively forbids us to worry about to-morrow. Our minister's wife made a real helpful talk on this subject at our last woman's prayer-meeting. In it she told how some good man—John Newton, I think—had said that each day of life is like a stick of wood given us to carry, and how we are promised strength to be able to do it. But, he said, when we lay atop of that to-morrow's stick, and day after to-morrow's, and next week's, it's no wonder that we break down. We are abusing God's long-suffering, and not keeping ourselves back from presumptuous sins. He holds fast to his word. The trouble is we haven't obeyed orders. 'For,' as she said, 'there is nowhere in God's word the promise of grace for faggots.'"

"But there! I ain't going to preach any longer. Dr. Bacon makes lots of fun about that very thing. He says my tongue runs like a mill-race when I get started upon the Royal Road."

"I am not tired—except of myself, and my own thoughts!"

The last words escaped her unguardedly. She tossed her hands out restlessly upon the coverlet.

"It is good in you to talk to me of something else. It all sounds as if it ought to hold a world of comfort—if we only had the key. I can understand—" with a sort of sorrowful archness—"why you have been so patient with me all these dreary days. You took me by the day. Go on with your story. What is this Royal Road at which Dr. Bacon laughs?"

"That's Mr. Stevens' name for it. In the first sermon I ever heard him preach he said, as near as I can recollect:

"'We were told when we were little tots of children, and were so foolish as to think that we could read right off, without learning our A, B, C's, that there is no Royal Road to learning. That is a fact there is no getting around. It's just as truly a fact and a far more glorious one, that there is a Royal Road to Happiness. That's what all the men and women that have lived for the last six thousand years have been trying to find—the certain way to be happy.' Then he went on to describe the hundreds of ways they'd taken, the blood that had been shed, the money that had been wasted, the hearts that had been broken, the souls that had been lost in searching for happiness along the wrong roads. There are as many of them, he told us, as there are stars in the milky way, and folks are all the time opening and laying out new ones."

"At last he said if we'd all come again next Sunday night, he'd tell us how to find and how to keep in the Royal Road to Happiness. And with that, he gave out a hymn and pronounced the benediction, and sent us home, not knowing whether to laugh or be provoked, but all of a mind about coming again next Sunday night."

"He's all the time doing that sort of thing. Folks call him 'eccentric' and 'sensational,' and harder names than those, but he knows how to 'fetch' the common people. Come to look at his ways, they mayn't after all, be very different from what St. Paul meant by catching his hearers by guile. I shouldn't wonder if the Scribes and Pharisees brought some such railing accusations against the Saviour when they found him telling him stories to the multitude about Prodigal Sons, and Unjust Stewards, and Houses built on the Sand, and Rich Men and Beggars, and calling their attention to lilies-of-the-field and red sunrises."

"Well, you may be sure, we were all on hand next Sunday evening, and it looked like every one of us had fetched his own brother and his own sister to boot. There wasn't room to move, and hardly air enough to breathe with the people packed into the seats and standing in the aisle."

"It's time for your drops again, I see! They're pleasant than the last, ain't they?" when the medicine had been taken. "They're beginning to take hold of you, too, I can see. Your color is better and strength is coming into your body. I've faith in Dr. Bacon, if he does enjoy making game of me."

She broke off at the sound of a tap at the door.

"It's the little ones on their way to their supper," she said tenderly.

CHAPTER VIII.

'Tis easy to be gentle when Death's silence shames our clamor, And easy to discern the best

Through memory's mystic glamor;

But wise it were for thee and me,

Ere love is past forgiving,

To take the tender lesson home—

Be patient with the living!

—Margaret E. Sangster.

Marie brought in the three children.

It was Friday afternoon, and she had arrived at four o'clock to pass the Sabbath at home. After sitting for half-an-hour with her mother she had volunteered to look after the children while Elspeth was busy below-stairs. Since Mrs. Williams had been put in charge of the sick-room a sullen change had gradually stolen over the girl's face and demeanor, unperceived, apparently, by the mother, but painful to Elspeth, and perplexing to the hired nurse.

From her birth this daughter had been the father's favorite child. Latterly, the tie between them had been the romantic element in her young life. He had laughed to himself, slyly, sometimes, at certain indications that her devotion to him went to the length of being jealous of the lovely attentions he liked to pay his wife when the fancy seized him to act the exemplary husband. From the time the child could run alone she used to declare that she intended to marry Papa when she was grown; her seat was next his at table, and she was oftentimes selected as his companion in drive or walk. Her vivacious chatter amused the world-weary man; he liked to lie upon the lounge, his head in Marie's lap, her fingers toying with curls from which her own had caught their sunshine, while his wife played plaintive nocturnes and brilliant sonatas for his delectation. Mrs. Paull did not interfere with the display of injudicious favoritism. Whatever helped to keep Ernest at home, and bind him to the children, must be for good. While Marie remained dutiful and affectionate to herself, she found no fault with her greater fondness for her father. It was better that she should idealize him than to learn prematurely, to know him for what he was.

Following what he knew would be his sister's wishes on this head, Roger Lanier had told the girl that troublesome business had called her father abroad for an indefinite period, and enjoined upon her the necessity of avoiding allusions to him in her mother's presence while she remained ill.

"You are old enough to understand, Marie, that there are unpleasant complications in business-life, and that some of these would deprive a man of his good name, in the estimation of some people," he added, awkwardly enough, for the fixed gaze of the blue eyes challenged the correctness of his tale. "I cannot enter into particulars, at present. You must try to believe that I am acting for the best, and be very patient with your mother, until she is strong enough to take control of her own affairs."

My name is Anthony Hunt. I am a drover, and I live many miles away upon the western prairie. There wasn't a house in sight when we moved there, my wife and I; and now we haven't many neighbors, though those we have are good men.

One day about ten years ago, I went away from home to sell some fifty head of cattle—fine creatures as ever I saw. I was to buy some groceries and dry goods before I came back and, above all, a doll for our youngest child, Dolly (she never had a hop-doll of her own, only the rag-babies her mother made her). Dolly could talk of nothing else, and went down to the very gate to call after me to "buy a big one."

Nobody but a parent can understand how my mind was on that toy, and how, when the cattle were sold, the first thing I started off to buy was Dolly's doll. I found a large one, with eyes that would open and shut when you pulled a wire, and had it wrapped up in paper, and tucked it under my arm while I had the parcels of calico, and delaine, and tea, and sugar put up. It might have been more prudent to have stayed until the morning, but I felt anxious to get back, and eager to hear Dolly's prattle about the doll he was so eagerly expecting.

I mounted a steady-going old horse of mine and, pretty well loaded, started for home. Night set in before I was a mile from town, and settled down dark as pitch while I was in the midst of the wildest bit of road I know of. I could have felt my way through, I remembered it so well, and it was almost like doing that when the storm that had been brewing broke, and the rain fell in torrents. I was five, or may be six miles from home, too. I rode on as fast as I could; but suddenly I heard a little cry, like a child's voice. I stopped short and listened. I heard it again: I called, and it answered me. I couldn't see a thing: all was dark as pitch. I got down and felt about in the grass: called again, and again was answered.

Then I began to wonder. I'm not timid; but I was known to be a drover, and to have money about me. I thought it might be a trap to catch me, and there to rob and murder me. I am not superstitious—not very—but how could a real child be out on the prairie in such a night at such an hour? It might be more than human. The bit of coward that hides itself in most men showed itself in me then, and I was half inclined to run away. But once more I heard that piteous cry, and, said I: "If any man's child is hereabouts, Anthony Hunt is not the man to let it lie here and die."

I searched again. At last I bethought me of a hollow under the hill, and groped that way. Sure enough, I found a little dripping thing, that moaned and sobbed as I took it in my arms. I called my horse, and he came to me, and I mounted, and tucked the little soaked thing under my coat as best I could, promising to take it home to mamma.

It seemed tired to death, and soon cried itself to sleep against my bosom. It had slept there over an hour when I saw my own windows. There were lights in them, and I supposed my wife had lit them for my sake; but when I got into the door-yard, I saw something was the matter, and stood still with dead fear of heart five minutes before I could lift the latch. At last I did it, and saw the room full of neighbors, and my wife amid them weeping. When she saw me she hid her face.

"Oh, don't tell him," she said; "it will kill him."

"What is it, neighbors?" I cried. And one said: "Nothing now, I hope. What's that in your arms?"

The Best Man Wanted.

"Yes, sir; we want some good men, men of first-class character and ability to represent us. Among our representatives are many of the noblest and best men in America, and parties of that stamp can always find a splendid business opportunity at our establishment." That is the way Mr. B. F. Johnson of the firm of B. F. Johnson & Co., Richmond, Va., stated the case in reference to their advertisement in this paper.

"A poor lost child," said I. "I found it on the road. Take it, will you? I've turned faint." And I lifted the sleeping thing, and saw the face of my own child, my little Dolly. It was my darling, and no other, that I had picked up on the drenched road. My little child had wandered out to meet papa and the doll, while her mother was at work, and for her they were lamenting as for one dead.

I thanked God on my knees before them all.

It is not much of a story, neighbors; but I think of it often in the nights, and wonder how I could bear to live now, if I had not stopped when I heard the cry for help upon the road—"the little baby-cry, hardly louder than a squirrel's chirp."

Is God less pitiful than man? "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him."

The old legend was that the clothes of the Israelites, which the Bible said waxed not old upon them in the desert during those forty years, not merely waxed not old during that period, but grew with their growth, so that the little Hebrew who crossed the Red Sea in his boy's clothes, wore the same clothes when he came to the borders of the Promised Land. It is the parable of that which comes to the man who has a true Christian faith, a faith which comes in the personal friendship of Christ, a faith which comes not in the belief of certain things about him, not in the doing slavishly of certain things which it seemed as if it had been said by him that we must do, but in the personal entrance into his nature in a life for him in which he is able to send his life down into us.

How that idea has haunted men in every period of their existence, how it is haunting you, that there is some higher life which it is possible to live. There has never been a religion that has not started there, lifted up its eyes and seen afar off, what it was possible for man to do, from day to day, in contrast with the things which were immediately and presently are. There is not any movement of the human soul which has not rested upon some great conception that man has a nobler being than he has ordinarily conceived himself to be; that he was not destined to the things which were ordinarily occupying his life; that he might be living a greater and nobler life. It is because the Christian Scriptures have laid most earnestly hold of this idea, it was because it was represented not simply in the words which Christ said, but in the very being which Christ was that we go to them to get the inspiration, and the indication, the revelation and enlightenment which we need.

The Grip

Has shown by its sudden attacks, its terrible prostration, and its serious, often fatal results, that it is a disease to be feared. For a fully developed case of the Grip, the care of a skilled physician is necessary.

To Prevent the Grip

We confidently recommend Hood's Sarsaparilla, which purifies the blood, keeps the kidneys and liver in healthy action, gives strength where it is needed, and keeps up the health-tone so that the system readily throws off attacks of the Grip or of Diphtheria, Typhoid Fever, Pneumonia, etc.

After the Grip

Hood's Sarsaparilla is unequalled for purifying the blood and restoring strength.

A SIBERIAN CROESUS.

IN an official report, issued by the United States Bureau of Education, a detailed account is given of the philanthropic effort to introduce domestic reindeer into Alaska from Siberia, with the object of relieving the destitute condition of the Alaskan Eskimo. At one part of the journey, the steamer anchored off a village known as Indian Point, in Seniavine Straits, on the extreme northeastern coast of Siberia.

The commissioner, Mr. Sheldon Jackson, writes thus of what followed: "Soon a number of natives came on board, among them being Ko-har-ra, the leading man of the village. After breakfast the captain and myself had a long conference with him concerning the purchase of reindeer, and a proposition was made to buy his whole herd of one hundred reindeer. He declined our offer, pleading as an excuse that he was keeping his herd for a time of need; that if, any season, the walrus and seal should fail him, he would need his herd to keep the people of the village from starving. In Ko-har-ra's storehouse, which was the only frame house in the village, I counted 200 sacks of flour and 80 boxes of tobacco; also a head of walrus bone, worth from $5,000 to $8,000. Another interview was had with Ko-har-ra, which resulted in his refusing to sell any of his deer.

KO-HAR-RA.

The richest man in North-east Siberia.

The meeting with this Siberian Croesus was the precursor of similar disappointments in other directions, but at last a supply of deer was secured. Instances of strange superstitions were encountered. It seems a very common practice among some of the tribes, when a person has an incurable disease or becomes too old for further service in procuring the necessities of life, to kill him. The conditions of life are so hard, the difficulties of feeding the well so great, that no supernumeraries can be allowed in those homes.

According to an Alaskan legend, the extermination of deer and the impoverishment of the people of a large section of that bleak country was the result of a tribal feud many generations ago, and long before a single Christian missionary had ever visited either Alaska or Siberia. Under the beneficent influence of the Gospel, tribal feuds have ceased and a better feeling exists between the Siberians and the Alaskans.

the death of Miss Tucker, the famous author of many charming stories who wrote under the "nom de plume" of A.L.O.E. (a Lady of England), was briefly announced in our issue of Jan. 17. We are now enabled to publish her portrait. Her life was, like her works, singularly pure and noble. About eighteen years ago, desiring to consecrate the remainder of her life entirely to the Lord's service, she went to India at her own cost and, settling down at the little town of Batala in Northern Punjab, she lored untiringly among the native women and children until her death. The Rev. J. Clark, who saw much of her work there, in communicating the news of her death, writes: "The story of how she lived and labored and died among the people to whom she was sent at the age of fifty-four, and with whom she remained, without once returning to England, to the age of seventy-two, will be one of the most interesting and inspiring records in the annals of Missions. Her visits to zenanas in both town and village in her little dhoolie, her wonderful influence among the boys at the Baring High School at Batala, and her attachment to them and theirs to her, can never be forgotten. A quarter of a century ago her books were to be found in almost every Christian household. When we consider that she wrote over 150 volumes, some idea may be formed of her industry, apart from her genius. One of her most beautiful stories was published in this journal in 186, under the title "At the Mission."

The famous Hindu god Lingam is now owned by an English gentleman, who paid sum equal to $13,000 for it at an auction sale of East India relics in 1888. The age stands but twelve and a half inches high; but, small as it is, it is well worth its weight in first-water diamonds. The base of pure hammered gold, and around it are nine gems—a diamond, ruby, sapphire, chrysoberyl, cat's-eye, coral, pearl, hyacinth, garnet, emerald and moonstone. The top, which is in the shape of a pyramid, is encircled with a plinth set with small, but very fine diamonds. The pinnacle is a totem in the shape of a horseshoe, the centre being a cat's-eye of exceeding brilliancy. When the last king of Delhi was exiled to the Andaman Islands his queen secreted this idol, and it was never seen again until recent research brought it to light.

Business depression is affecting the incomes the Missionary Societies. The executive committee of the Baptist Missionary Union reports that of the $600,000 imperatively necessary for the year's expenses the first eight months have brought only $62,178.

It is particularly useful in making weak nerves strong, as it contains necessary elements of nutrition for the nervous system, obtained from natural sources.

* * * INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

[illegible]

Recommended to all who have tried its merits—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering it so brittle that it falls out, and the skin is left as smooth as the skin of a baby. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in afloat mailing case, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by express, or by registered mail, and we will send you a bottle daily. If you do not wish to pay by express, we will send you the same as cash. Saucy Pansies though we be,
We would have you know
That we know a thing or two—
BURPEE'S SEEDS WILL GROW.

In 1892, when we first advertised THE LATEST FASHIONS IN PANSIES, five packets for 25 cents, a prominent seedsman said to us: "You are ruining the Seed Trade." Probably other seedsman, equally short sighted, thought the same of last year's advertisement of SWEET PEAS are All the Go. We now surpass all previous offers in the FOUR FAVORITE FORDHOOK COLLECTIONS FOR 1894, advertised on this page.

What will our competitors say to this? But legitimate competition is the life of trade, let them make it still livelier if they can. So long as they do not sell cheap seeds (cheap in quality as well as quantity), it is all to the benefit of horticulture. We only wish other seedsman would join with us in trying to persuade everyone who lives in town or country to learn the delights of gardening. In this new country of ours the trouble is that the struggle for material prosperity is so absorbing, that many are in such a hurry to add dollar to dollar, that they overlook the pleasure (and profit, too, for that matter, to both purse and person) to be derived from a good garden. "Gardening is the first and noblest pursuit of man."

LET US TALK TO YOU

more fully than we can on this single page of THE HERALD. You can buy a postal card for a cent, and if on it you write, "I intend to plant seeds this spring," and mention The Christian Herald, we will gladly mail you Burpee's FARM ANNUAL FOR 1894, a handsome book of 172 pages, which costs us more than ten cents a copy in quarter-million editions. We will try to persuade you to prove for yourself the truth of the well-known motto that

BURPEE'S SEEDS GROW

and are
The BEST SEEDS That Grow.

On the "address only" side of the postal write W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Philadelphia, Pa., but do not forget to write your own name and address plainly on the reverse side, and remember we trust you. If you have no use for seeds, but want THE FARM ANNUAL merely because you are interested in the progress of horticulture or desire the beautiful paintings from nature for framing, we expect that you will send a sealed letter enclosing either a silver dime or five two-cent stamps.

Poppies rare and poppies fair,
Nodding to and fro;
The tiniest seed will show the breed—
BURPEE'S SEEDS WILL GROW.

AMERICAN GARDENING.

The Enterprise of Some of Our Seedsman.

Not the least important source of information is the annual catalogue of the seedsman. Take, for instance, as a good model that of BURPEE & CO., of Philadelphia. The head of the firm, Mr. W. Atlee Burpee, holds a pre-eminent position as an authority in his business, and is a benefactor of his country through his devotion to the interests of American Gardening. What an exhibition does the tasty-looking pamphlet afford of the knowledge, skill, tact, and thorough business talent of its designer and author. It is a vast accomplishment to stand at the head of such a calling.

Consider the enterprise that traverses every country on the face of the earth to give us new and excellent things to delight the eye and to feed the hungry. It was at my house in New York that Mr. Burpee gave instructions to a young Chinaman whom I had introduced to him in regard to a commission to find what there was new in China for us, or to find any vegetable or fruit or flower that would add to human enjoyment. So Russia, and Hungary, and Holland, and France, and all the countries are watched, as well as our own fields, for some rare "sport" or some new "hybrid," that our gardens may be improved. Mr. Burpee has introduced more than seventy new and important varieties in vegetables into general cultivation, which are most valuable acquisitions, and have already contributed vastly to the excellence of our gardens. Some of these are of such pre-eminent quality that they should be in every American garden. The list is too long to enumerate here, but it is well to notice the BURPEE'S BUSH LIMA BEAN, which deserves the widest recognition. Extract from an article by J. S. LINSLEY, M.D., in COUNTRY GENTLEMAN, Albany, N. Y., September 25, 1893.

Four Favorite Fordhook Collections

That those who do not know us may be forever convinced that

Burpee's seeds grow.

we'll send at less than wholesale price, the FIRST AND FAMOUS IN VEGETABLES, the FASHION AND FANCY IN FLOWERS—the best varieties known, at merely nominal price. Any one collection for twenty-five cents, all four for a dollar. With the four we give Mrs. Rorer's brand new book, "How to Cook Vegetables," the best work in cookdom.

2 Collections of Beautiful Flowers.

FORDHOOK FASHION COLLECTION.

Comprises SIX NOVELTIES in three of the most fashionable flowers of the day, together with a bright booklet, entitled "PANSIES, POPPIES, AND SWEET PEAS." It contains:—

NEW SWEET PEA—AMERICAN FELLE. THE FLORAL NOVELTY FOR 1894. Extremely early, wonderfully free-flowering; bright rose with wings of crystal-white, vividly spotted rich purplish-carmine. See Colored Plate in Catalogue.

ECKFORD'S GILT EDGE, or SURPASSING SWEET PEAS. This grand strain of New Sweet Peas in mixture is unequalled; new seedlings.

BURPEE'S DEFIANCE PANSIES, FINEST MIXED. Magnificent new giant-flowered Pansies, which measure two and one-half to four inches across.

SUPERB NEW IMPERIAL GERMAN PANSIES. All known colors, including the brightest fancy varieties, blotched, veined, mottled, and margined.

NEW CARDINAL POPPY. Glowing cardinal-scarlet flowers, which are uniformly of enormous size and perfectly double; of great profusion and long duration in bloom.

GOLDEN GATE POPPIES. If you already have this superb strain you can give this packet to a friend, to whom the thousands of beautiful flowers will be a constant source of delight.

We have a beautiful colored plate, painted from nature, of the distinct new PANSIES, POPPIES, AND SWEET PEAS, which we will mail enclosed flat with our FARM ANNUAL for 1894.

The Complete Collection—one packet each of the above six varieties—mailed for 25 CENTS. With each collection we include free a copy of the bright new booklet, "PANSIES, POPPIES, AND SWEET PEAS," which is beautifully printed and charmingly illustrated, specially written for us by three well-known authors. We have thus an unique combination of the best literature on the subject, together with the choicest seeds.

FORDHOOK FANCY COLLECTION.

This collection embraces seeds of ten easy-growing annuals of real beauty that should be in every garden, it contains one full-sized packet each of all the following:

NEW YELLOW DOLICHOS. Quite unique, not only in color but also in habit of growth. The foliage is very dense, the stems show a hairy growth, and no vine is more quick growing.

ACTERS, CHOICE MIXED. Every color, many distinct types.

BALSAM, BURPEE'S SUPERB CAMELLIA-FLOWERED. Magnificent double flowers of unusual perfection; all colors.

MARGUERITE CARNATIONS. Perfect double carnations in full beauty, all colors, in four months after sowing the seed.

CALLIOPSIS CORONATA. Brightest yellow flowers of large size.

The entire collection, one packet each of the above ten varieties, mailed to any address for 25 CENTS, which is less than one-third the regular retail price, if purchased separately. Five Collections for $1.00.

2 Collections of Choicest Vegetables.

FORDHOOK FIRST COLLECTION.

Most appropriately named, as this collection comprises the five earliest vegetables, those first to mature, and all of which are of Fordhook introduction. Everyone in the spring is especially desirous of getting the first fresh vegetables on the table. This collection contains one full size packet each of:—

EARLY BLACK LIMA BEAN. Bears great ropes of pods in wonderful profusion, two weeks earlier than any other Lima.

NEW TOMATO—FORDHOOK FIRST. Extremely early; the only first early tomato that is always smooth and perfect.

BURPEE'S ALL-HEAD EARLY CABBAGE. Thousands of gardeners testify that this is the most thoroughbred and best Early Cabbage.

COLUMBIA BEET. This distinct new Beet is the earliest of all; of surpassingly fine flavor.

BURPEE'S EARLIEST RADISH. Ready to pull in only 20 days from the time of sowing the seed.

One full-size packet each of the above Five FORDHOOK FIRST TOMATO.

FORDHOOK FIRST Vegetables mailed for 25 CENTS. Each packet bears an illustration of the variety, our registered trade-mark, and directions for culture. Purchased separately, the five packets would cost 60 cents, but together as a collection they can be had for 25 cents—less than wholesale price.

FORDHOOK FAMOUS COLLECTION.

This collection is also appropriately named, as it embraces five of the most famous vegetables introduced from Fordhook Farm. It contains one full-size packet each of:—

BURPEE'S BUSH LIMA. The only bush form of the true large Lima Bean, and universally pronounced the most remarkable of new vegetables.

BURPEE'S SUREHEAD CABBAGE. See page 52 of the FARM ANNUAL for the record of seventeen years' trials of this world-famous Cabbage.

NEW ICEBERG LETTUCE. On our colored plate we show a head painted from nature, and truly tell the decided merits of this rare novelty.

BURPEE'S MELROSE MELON. No other melon is so handsome and none can equal this in delicious flavor. The flesh is quite unique in color, being of a beautiful light green, shading to rich salmon.

WHITE VICTORIA ONION. Famous for the large size it attains, particularly under the new onion culture.

NEW ICEBERG LETTUCE.

One packet each of the above Five FAMOUS FORDHOOK Vegetables would cost 60 cents, if selected at retail, but we include the five packets in our FORDHOOK FAMOUS COLLECTION for 25 CENTS, postpaid. On each packet is printed an illustration, our registered trade-mark and directions for culture.

There's no profit in it, but it pays us, for we know the quality of our seeds—a trial order means a permanent customer. We can fill the hundreds of thousands of orders we expect from readers of the Christian Herald and a few other great publications like it. Not space enough here to describe these varieties; we simply brief them; all about them in the leading American seed catalogue, 172 pages, hundreds of illustrations direct from photographs, beautiful colored plates as bright and true as Nature. New designs for '94, noteworthy novelties nobody else has. The original, interesting, and instructive seed book of the world, valuable to everybody. Mailed free to everyone who plants seeds; to others 10 cents, which is less than cost.

For a Dollar

We will send ALL FOUR FAVORITE FORDHOOK COLLECTIONS as advertised, neatly boxed, by mail postpaid together with Mrs. Rorer's New Book, "How to Cook Vegetables."

Every housewife wants Mrs. Rorer's New Book, "How to Cook Vegetables," and many have written to inquire its price. Although the copyright is owned by us, we are under contract not to sell a single copy, otherwise we could have sold thousands of this book at $1.00 each during the past two years. So suppose there are some seeds in the four Collections which you do not need, why not purchase a complete set for $1.00, and thus get this valuable book FREE as a premium? Surely you can give the extra seeds to some friend. If you live in the city and are so unfortunate as to have no garden of your own, what more acceptable present could you send to a friend in the country than these four Collections of FORDHOOK SEEDS, at the same time instructing us to mail the book separately to your own address.

Purchased separately at retail, the 26 packets of seed enumerated on this page, would cost $2.00, while the cook book of 182 pages is fully worth 50 cents—making in all an actual value of $3.40 for $1.00.

If requested, we will include in each complete box with the seeds and book a small sample packet also of the valuable new WHITE CAP DENT CORN as described on page 35 of THE FARM ANNUAL. This is really the best Field Corn in cultivation to-day, and we desire to introduce it to every farmer.

TO TELL YOU MORE of the great DOLLAR offer we must remind you that our new book, "Selection in Seed Growing," can be had free with any dollar order, so you are, of course, entitled to this unique book of 112 pages if you ask for it when sending us $1.00 for this offer. Please mention Christian Herald.

Modern Methods of the Seed Trade.

This is the title of a very interesting article by Mr. C. L. ALLEN the well-known agricultural writer of New York. In connection with other articles it describes the methods of seed growing and seed testing at Fordhook, and will be of real interest to all our patrons. But besides these articles on our own operations, the new book, SELECTION IN SEED GROWING, gives all the most important papers read before the Seedsman's Session of the World's Horticultural Congress at Chicago.

AN ORIENTAL MARKET-PLACE.

Jaffa and its Bazaars—The Busy Aspect its Market Presents Before Easter—A Picturesque and Ancient City, Possibly of Ante-diluvian Origin.

JAFFA, Joppa, or Yafa, as it is variously called, is a city with a history that reaches back to remotest antiquity. Pliny, the historian, says it had an existence even in ante-diluvian times, and Rabbinical writers assert that it received its name from Japhet, the son of Noah. Josephus claims for it a Phœnician origin. It has been made the scene and the subject of Greek myth and tradition. No city in the world has had a more eventful experience, for it has been alternately pagan, Jew, Moslem, Arab, Mameluke and Christian, and has been sacked and wasted by war, swept by pestilence, and rebuilt, walled and fortified, only to be again levelled by fire and sword and battering-ram. Around and over it have surged the tides of the wars of the Maccabees of the Vespasian and Pompey, of the Saracens and Crusaders, and of the invading armies of Napoleon. It was last held by the Christians in 1253. The build-

Tabitha to life and baptized the first Gentile household. But the ancient glories of Jaffa have passed away forever, and the city is little more than the shadow of its former splendor. Its towers and minarets are picturesque ruins, its houses mostly poor and dirty, and its winding lanes and alleys uninviting. This aspect is redeemed by the freshness and beauty of its towering palms, its lemon groves, orange orchards and fruit gardens. Since the opening of the railroad to Jerusalem, the city has taken on a somewhat livelier aspect and its dwindling population of Moslems, Syrians, Greeks, Jews, East Indians and Europeans has been augmented considerably. The liveliest spot in the city is the market-place, which is shown in the photograph on this page. Here the vendors spread out their wares and, raising canvas canopies, sit in the shade and wait for custom. Fruit is the staple stock, and the best oranges and pomegranates in the world come from Jaffa's orchards. Turbanned men, veiled women, with here and there a little brown-skinned, bare-footed boy, move in and out among the booths. Purchases are made in a fashion that highly amuses any European or American, who may happen to overhear the buyer and seller. One has to be careful in moving about, to avoid being stepped upon by the heavily-laden camels, or coming into collision with the equally over-burdened donkeys. The principal bazaar, which is outside the city gates, is a source of wonder and entertainment to those who are strangers to Eastern life. For a few piastres one can enjoy a surfeit of the most delicious fruits. The moving panorama of Asiatics in all the different costumes of a score of nationalities the wondering groups of pilgrims,—principally Rus-ing of walls on all sides, except that facing the sea, and the erection of twenty-four towers and three great gates cost a fabulous sum; but the Sultans of Egypt, who afterwards conquered it, laid it again in ruins. Its next masters were the Turks, who have held it ever since.

In Biblical story, Jaffa occupies an important place. It was the port of Jerusalem in the times of the early Jewish kings, and it was here that the flotillas of cedar and pine for the building of the Temple were landed. Cyrus, long generations afterward, also used it as a port of entry for material for the second Temple. Here Jonah "took ship to flee from the presence of his Maker." It was here, too, on the housetop of Simon the tanner, that the Apostle Peter saw the wonderful vision, and here he raised the aged sians—who come here by the thousand about Easter-time on their way to Jerusalem, and the many legendary and historic places in the ancient city, all combine to make Jaffa a centre of interest to the visitor, who, coming to Palestine by sea, there first sets foot upon the soil of the land where the Saviour was born. Within the next few weeks, the venerable seaport town will be filled with strangers from many lands, and its caravanseries will be crowded with devout pilgrims on their way to the Holy City to participate in the Easter celebration of the Passover, which for centuries has attracted the faithful from all parts of the world. At that time, every creed in Christendom is represented at the gathering in the Chapel of the Holy Sepulchre, when the spectacle of the "Holy Fire" is witnessed by the multitudes.

RUBIES SURPASSED.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.
Text: Proverbs 8: 11, "Wisdom is better than rubies."

YOU have all seen the precious stone commonly called the ruby. It is of deep red color. The Bible makes much of it. It glowed in the first row of the high-priest's breast-plate. Under another name it stood in the wall of heaven. Jeremiah compares the ruddy cheek of the Nazarites to the ruby. Ezekiel points it out in the robes of the king of Tyre. Four times does Solomon use it as a symbol by which to extol wisdom, or religion, always setting its value as better than Rubies.

The world does not agree as to how the precious stones were formed. The ancients thought that amber was made of drops of perspiration of the goddess Ge. The thunderstone was supposed to have dropped from a storm-cloud. The emerald was said to have been made of the fire-fly. The lapis lazuli was thought to have been born of the cry of an Indian giant. And modern mineralogists say that the precious stones were made of gases and liquids. To me the ruby seems like a spark from the anvil of the setting sun.

The home of the genuine ruby is Burmah, and sixty miles from its capital, where lives and reigns the ruler, called, "Lord of the Rubies." Under a careful governmental guard are these valuable mines of ruby kept. Rarely has any foreigner visited them. When a ruby of large value was discovered it was brought forth with elaborate ceremony, a procession was formed, and with all bannered pomp, military guard and princely attendants, the gem was brought to the king's palace.

Of great value is the ruby, much more so than diamond, as lapidaries and jewelers will tell you. An expert on this subject, writes: "A ruby of perfect color weighing five carats is worth at the present day ten times as much as a diamond of equal weight." It was a disaster when Charles the Bold lost the ruby he was wearing at the Battle of Grandson. It was a great affluence when Rudolph the Second of Austria inherited a ruby from his sister, the Queen Dowager. It was thought to have had much to do with the victory of Henry the Fifth, as he wore it into the Battle of Agincourt. It is the pride of the Russian court to own the largest ruby of all the world, presented by Gustavus the Third to the Russian Empress. Wondrous ruby! It has electric characteristics, and there are lightnings compressed in its double six-sided prisms. What shall I call it? It is frozen fire! It is petrified blood! In all the world there is only one thing more valuable, and my text makes the comparison: "Wisdom is better than Rubies."

But it is impossible to compare two things together unless there are some points of similarity as well as of difference. I am glad there is nothing lacking here. The ruby is more beautiful in the night and under the lamplight than by day. It is preferred for evening adornment. How the rubies glow, and burn, and flash as the lights lift the darkness! Catherine of Arragon had on her finger a ruby that fairly lanterned the night. Sir John Mandeville, the celebrated traveler of four hundred years ago, said that the Emperor of China had a ruby that made the night as bright as the day. The probability is that Solomon under some of the lamps that illumined his cedar palace by night, noticed the peculiar glow of the ruby as it looked in the hilt of a sword, or hung in some fold of the upholstery, or beautified the lip of some chalice, while he was thinking at the same time of the excellency of our holy Religion as chiefly seen in the night of trouble, and he cries out, "Wisdom is better than rubies."

Oh, yes, it is a good thing to have religion while the sun of prosperity rides high and everything is brilliant in fortune, in health, in worldly favor. Yet you can at such time hardly tell how much of it is natural exuberance and how much of it is the grace of God. But let the sun set, and the shadows avalanche the plain, and the thick darkness of sickness, or poverty, or persecution, or mental exhaustion fill the soul, and fill the house, and fill the world; then you sit down by the lamp of God's Word and under its light the consolations of the Gospel come out; the peace of God which passeth all understanding appears. You never fully appreciated their power until in the deep night of trouble the Divine Lamp revealed their exquisiteness. Pearls and amethysts for the day, but rubies for the night.

All of the books of the Bible attempt in some way the assuagement of misfortune. Of the one hundred and fifty Psalms of David at least ninety allude to trouble. There are sighings in every wind, and tears in every brook, and pangs in every heart. It was originally proposed to call the President's residence at Washington, "The Palace," or "The Executive Mansion," but after it was destroyed in the war of 1814 and rebuilt, it was painted white, to cover up the marks of the smoke and fire that had blackened the stone walls. Hence it was called, "The White House." Most of the things now white with attractiveness were once black with disaster. What the world most needs is the consolatory, and here it comes, our holy religion, with both hands full of anodynes, and sedatives, and balsams, as in Daniel's time to stop mouths leonine; as in Shadrach's time to cool blast furnaces; as in Ezekiel's time to console captivity; as in St. John's time to unroll an apocalypse over rocky desolations. Hear its soothing voice as it declares: "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning;" "The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed, but my loving-kindness shall not depart from you;" "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth;" "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." The most wholesome thing on earth is trouble if met in Christian spirit. To make Paul what he was it took shipwreck, and whipping on the bare back, and penitentiary, and pursuit of wild mobs, and the sword of decapitation. To make David what he was it took all that Ahithophel and Saul and Absalom and Goliath and all the Philistine hosts could do against him. It took Robert Chambers' malformation of feet to make him the literary conqueror. It was bereavement that brought William Haworth of Wesley's time from wickedness to an evangelism that won many thousands for heaven. The world would never have known what heroic stuff Ridley was made of had not the fires been kindled around his feet, and, not liking their slow work, he cried, "I cannot burn; let the fire come to me; I cannot burn." Thank God that there are gems that unfold their best glories under the lamp-light! Thank God for the Ruby!

Moreover, I am sure that Solomon was right in saying that religion, or wisdom, is better than rubies, from the fact that a thing is worth what it will fetch. Religion will fetch solid happiness, and the ruby will not. In all your observation did you ever find a person thoroughly felicitated by an encrustment of jewels? As you know more of yourself than anyone else, are you happier now with worldly adornments and successes than before you won them? Does the picture that cost you hundreds or thousands of dollars on your wall bring you as much satisfaction as the engraving that at the expense of five dollars was hung upon the wall when you first began to keep house? Do all the cutlery and rare plate that glitter on your extension dining-table surrounded by flattering guests contain more of real bliss than the plain ware of your first table, at which sat only two? Does a wardrobe crowded with costly attire give you more satisfaction than your first clothes-closet with its four or five pegs? Did not the plain ring set on the third finger of your left hand on the day of your betrothal give more gladness than the ruby that is now enthroned on the third finger of your right hand? If in this journey of life we have learned anything, we have learned that this world neither with its emoluments nor gains can satisfy the soul. Why, here come as many witnesses as I wish to call to the stand to testify that before high heaven and the world, in companionship with Jesus Christ and a good hope of heaven, they feel a joy that all the resources of their vocabulary fail to express. Sometimes it evidences itself in ejaculations of hosanna; sometimes in doxology; sometimes in tears. A converted native of India in a letter said: "How I long for my bed, not that I may sleep; I lie awake often and long, but to hold sweet communion with my God." If so mighty is worldly joy that Julius the Second hearing his armies were triumphant, expired; and if Talva hearing that the Roman Senate had decreed him an honor, expired; and if Dionysius and Sophocles overcome of joy, expired, and if a shipwrecked purser waiting on the coast of Guinea in want and starvation at the sight of a vessel bringing relief, fell dead from shock of delight; is it any surprise to you that the joys of pardon and heaven rolling over the soul should sometimes be almost too much for the Christian to endure and live? An aged aunt said to me, "DeWitt, three times I have fainted dead away under too great Christian joy. It was in all three cases at the Holy Communion." An eminent Christian man while in prayer said, "Stop, Lord, I cannot bear any more of this gladness; it is too much for mortal. Withhold! Withhold!" We have heard of poor workmen or workwomen getting a letter suddenly telling them that a fortune had been left them, and how they were almost beside themselves with glee, taking the first ship to claim the estate. But, oh, what it is to wake up out of the stupor of a sinful life and through pardoning grace find that all our earthly existence will be divinely managed for our best welfare, and that then all heaven will roll in upon the soul. Compared with that a Spring morning is stupid, and an August sunset is inane, and an aurora has no pillared splendor, and a diamond has no flash, and a pearl no light, and a beryl no aquamarine, and a ruby no ruddiness. My gracious Lord! My glorious God! My precious Christ! Roll over on us a few billows of that rapture. And now I ask you as fair-minded men and women, accustomed to make comparisons, is not such a joy as that worth more than anything one can have in a jeweled casket? Was not Solomon right when he said, "Wisdom is better than rubies?"

There is also something in the deep carmine of the ruby that suggests the sacrifice on which our whole system of religion depends. While the emerald suggests the meadows, and the sapphire the skies, and the opal the sea, the ruby suggests the blood of sacrifice. The most emphatic and starling of all colors hath the ruby. Solomon the author of my text, knew all about the sacrifice of lamb and dove on the altars of the temple, and he knew the meaning of sacrificial blood, and what other precious stone could he so well use to symbolize as the ruby? Red, intensely red, red as the blood of the greatest martyr of all time—Jesus of the centuries! Drive the story of the crucifixion out of the Bible and the doctrine of the atonement out of our religion, and there would be nothing of Christianity left for our worship or our admiration. What should it be hard to adopt the Bible theory that our redemption was purchased by blood? What great bridge ever sprung its arches; what temple ever reared its towers what nation ever achieved its independence what mighty good was ever done without sacrifice of life? The great wonder of the world, the bridge that unites these two cities, cost the life of the first architect. As the shipyards of Glasgow and New York how many carpenters went down under accidents before the steamer was launched ask the three great trans-continental railroads how many in their construction were buried under crumbling embankments, or crushed under timbers, or destroyed by the powder-blast. Tabulate the statistics of how many mothers have been martyrs to the cradle of sick children. Tell us how many men sacrificed nerve, and muscle and brain, and life in the effort to support their households. Tell me how many men in England, in France, in Germany, in Italy, in the United States have died for their country. Vicarious suffering is as old as the world, but the most thrilling, the most startling, the most stupendous sacrifice of all time and eternity, was on a bluff back of Jerusalem when one Being took upon himself the sins, the agonies, the perdition of a great multitude that no man can number, between twelve o'clock of a darkened noon and three o'clock in the afternoon, purchasing the ransom of a ruined world. Dive in all the seas; explore all the mines; crowbar all the mountains; view all the crowned jewels of all the emperors and find me any gem that can so overwhelmingly symbolize that martyrdom as the ruby. Mark you, there are many gems that are somewhat like the ruby. So is the cornelian; so is the garnet; so is the spinel; so is the balas; so the gems brought from among the gravels of Ceylon and New South Wales; but there is only one genuine ruby, and that comes from the mine of Burmah. And there is only one Christ, and he comes from heaven. One Redeemer, one Ransom, one Son of God, only "one Name given under heaven among men by which we can be saved." Ten thousand times ten thousand beautiful imitations of that ruby, but only one ruby. Christ had no descendant. Christ had no counterpart. In the lifted-up grandeur, and glory, and love, and sympathy of his character he is the Incomparable, the Infinite One! "The Only Wise God, our Saviour." Let all hearts, all homes, all times, all eternities bow low before him! Let his banner be lifted in all our souls.

In olden times, Scotland was disturbed by freebooters and pirates. To rid the seas and ports of these desperadoes, the hero, William Wallace fitted out a merchant vessel, but filled it with armed men, and put out to sea. The pirates with their flag inscribed of a death's head, thinking they would get an easy prize, bore down upon the Scottish merchantman, when the armed men of Wallace boarded the craft of the pirates and put them in chains, and then sailed for port under the Scotch flag flying. And so our souls assailed of sin and death and hell through Christ are rescued, and the black flag of sin is torn down and the striped flag of the Cross is hoisted. Blessed be God for any sign, for any signal, for any precious stone that brings to mind the price paid for such a rescue!

like the coral, for it seems the solidified form of breakers; and I like the jasper, for it gathers seventeen colors into its bosom; and I like the jet, for it compresses the shadows of many midnights; and I like the chrysolite, for its waves of color which seem on fire. But this morning nothing so impresses me as the ruby, for it depicts, it typifies, it suggests, "The blood of Jesus Christ that cleanseth from all sin:" "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission." Yea, Solomon was right when he said, "Wisdom is better than rubies."

To bring out a contrast that will illustrate my text, I put before you two last earthly scenes. The one is in a room with rubies, but no religion; and the other in a room with religion but no rubies. You enter the first room, where an affluent and worldly man is about to quit this life. There is a ruby on the mantel, possibly among the vases. There is a ruby in the head-dress of the queenly wife. On the finger of the young man there is a ruby. The presence of these rubies implies opulence of all kinds. The pictures on the walls are heir-looms, or trophies of European travel. The curtains are from foreign looms. The rugs are from Damascus or Cairo. The rocking-chairs roll backward and forward on lullabys. The pillows are exquisitely embroidered. All the appointments of the room are a peroration of a successful commercial or professional life. But the man has no religion; never has had, and never professed to have. There is not a Bible or one religious book in the room. The departing man feels that his earthly career is ended, and nothing opens beyond. Where he will land stepping off from this life is a mystery, or whether he will land at all, for it may be annihilation. He has no prayer to offer, and he does not know how to pray. No hope of meeting again in another state of existence. He is rough with this life, and is sure of no other. The ruby on the mantel and the ruby in the wasted finger of the departing one typify nothing of the ransoming blood which they so mightily typify. Midnight of utter hopelessness drops on all the scene.

Another room of mortal exit. Religion and no rubies. She never had money enough to buy one of these exquisite. Sometimes she stopped at a jeweler's showwindow and saw rows of them incarnadining the velvet. She had keen taste enough to appreciate those gems, but she never owned one of them. She was not jealous or unhappy because others had rubies while she had none. But she had richer treasure, and that was the grace of God that had comforted her along the way amid bereavements, and temptations, and persecutions, and sicknesses, and privations, and trials of all sorts. Now she is going out of life. The room is bright, not with pictures or statues, not with upholstery, not with any of the gems of mountain or of sea, but there is a strange and vivid glow in the room: not the light of chandelier, or star, or noon-day sun, but something that outshines all of them. It must be the presence of supernaturals. From her illumined face think she must hear sweet voices. Yea, she does hear sweet voices—voices of departed kindred: voices apostolic and prophetic, and evangelic, but all of them overpowered by the voice of Christ, saying, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom." From her illumined face, I think she must hear rapturous music. Yea, she does hear rapturous music, now soft as a breeze, now thunderous as orchestras: now faintly voice alone, now the hundred and forty and four thousand in concert. From her illumined face, I think she must breathe tenderness. Yea, she does inhale aroma from the gardens whose flowers never wither, and from the blossoms of orchards, every tree of which bears twelve manner of fruit. From her illumined face, I think she must see a glorious sight. Yes, she sees the wall that has jasper at the base, and amethyst at the top, and blood-red rubies between. Good-bye, sweet soul! Why should you linger stay! Your work all done; your burdens all carried; your tears all wept! Forward into the light! Up into the joy! Out into the grandeurs! And after you have saluted Christ, and your kindred, search out him of the palaces of Lebanon cedar, and tell him that you have found to be gloriously true what thousands of years ago be asserted in this morning's text: "Wisdom is better than rubies." In those burnished palaces of our God may we all meet. For I confess to you that my chief desire for heaven is not the radiance, or to take the suggestion of the text, not the rubescence of the scene. My one idea of heaven is the place to meet old friends, God our best Friend, and our earthly friends already transported. Aye! to meet the millions whom I have never seen, but to whom I have administered in the Gospel week by week through journalism on both sides of the sea, and throughout Christendom, and through many lands yet semi-barbaric. For the last twenty-three years every blast of injustice against me has multiplied my readers all the world over, and the present malignancy printed and uttered because our church is in financial struggle after having two great structures destroyed by fire, and we compelled to build three large churches—I say the present outrageous injustice in some quarters, will multiply my audience in all lands if I can keep in good humor and not fight back. A gentleman tapped me on the shoulder summer before last on a street of Edinburgh, Scotland, and said, "I live in the Shetland Islands, North Scotland, and I read your sermons every Sabbath to an audience of neighbors, and my brother lives in Cape Town, South Africa, and he reads them every Sabbath to an audience of his neighbors." And I here and now say to the forty millions of the earth to whose eyes these words will come, that one of my dearest anticipations is to meet them in heaven. Ah! that will be better than rubies. Coming up from different continents, from different hemispheres, from opposite sides of the earth to greet each other in holy love in the presence of the glorious Christ who made it possible for us to get there. Our sins all pardoned, our sorrows all banished, never to weep, never to part, never to die! I tell you that will be better than rubies. Others may have the crowns, and the thrones, and the sceptres: give us our old friends back again, Christ, "the friend who sticketh closer than a brother," and all the kindred who have gone up from our bereft households, and all our friends whom we have never yet seen, and you may have all the rubies, for that will be "better than rubies." Instead of the dying kiss when they looked so pale and wan and sick, it will be the kiss of welcome on lips jubilant with song, while standing on floors paved with what exquisiteness, under ceilings hung with what glory, bounded by walls facing us with what splendor, amid gladness rolling over us with what Doxology. Far better, infinitely better, everlastingly better than rubies.

The Delayed Harvest of Souls.

Dr. Robert H. Nassau Visits the Station at Talaguga, Africa, Which he Planted Nineteen Years Ago, and sees the Fruits of His Pioneer Work.

scene of his early labors. It is now in the hands of French Protestant Missionaries, who gave him a warm welcome, and gladly showed him in their church the fruits of the seed he had planted years ago in the midst of sorrow and discouragement. Dr Nassau says:

I have been re-visiting my former home, Talaguga, on the Ogove River, two hundred miles from its Cape Lopez mouth. Our mission no longer has any property or duty on that river, we having withdrawn because of the unfriendly and harassing acts of the French Government, on educational and other subjects. But, in so withdrawing, there was no abandonment of our Ogove churches. That portion of our field was, evangelistically, the jewel of our mission. We transferred it to the care of our Protestant brethren of the Paris Evangelical Society, who assumed it only at our urgency; our hope in this transfer being that they as Frenchmen would be able, better than at Kangeve a flourishing School and church which were still more largely developed during the ten subsequent years by the three efficient brethren who successively followed me. And it fell to my lot in 1882, to resume the role of a pioneer, and survey for a new station at Talaguga, seventy miles farther up river, on the way to (always our objective point) the far Interior.

It must be acknowledged that the path did not then look very hopeful. But it was the only open path in our entire mission-field. Entrances that had been attempted at other points had failed through native monopolist opposition and other causes.

Some of my visitors, who had not taken the wide survey I had, wondered that I located a mission-station at a place where there were no materials for a school or a church! True, there were in the beginning, March 1882, within a mile on each side of the new station, five villages aggregating not more than about five hundred people. Truly, a poor outlook for much direct missionary work! But subsequent events have more than justified me. It was with no sense of disheartenment that, on taking a needed furlough in the beginning of 1891, I handed over the station to my successors, Rev. and Mrs. W. S. Bannerman. My only regret was that the church back of me had been unable to give me the new men and the means for advancing fifty or even twenty miles farther into the region of the Rapids.

Roman Catholic missionaries had passed me during those years, and had located hundreds of miles up the rapids. The care of my little motherless babe would not have been a bar to my own going to start a new station, had any one else been provided for that new station, or to take my place at Talaguga. To my successor, Mr. Bannerman, all that I claimed or prophesied for Talaguga, became true. Population crowded around him. The Gospel was welcomed. A school became an organized reality. Under his efficient zeal, distant clans were visited. The seed he and I had sown sprang up. Two years later, the transfer removed Mr. Bannerman from Talaguga, and passed it over to the Rev. E. and Madame Allegret, of the Paris Evangelical Society: under whose wise hands the work is blossoming into success.

It was at this stage of affairs that I made my recent visit. What I saw was this: a school of thirty boys and girls (with applications from more than 100, had there been means, room, and sufficient teaching aid.) I stood in the chapel, now used as school-room my former little school and prayer-room being now entirely too small) and saw the sons of wild Fang, orderly, reading, writing in their copy books, and doing small sums in arithmetic on the blackboard. That chapel, with capacity for only 100 people, which I had built in faith, when as yet sometimes not more than ten Fang were willing to come there, I saw filled at the Sabbath service.

On the one Sabbath which I spent under Brother Allegret's hospitable roof, it was my very great privilege to assist him in the organization of a fifth Ogove church. A church for Fang! With most delicate consideration for me, he recognized my share in the labor preceding these results, and, aware that I intended to make him a visit, he had delayed this ceremony until I could come and take part in it. In the truest of missionary spirit, he felt no jealousy of the welcome his people gave me, nor of the expression of honor they offered me as their first "Father." A large Inquiry Class under his care was being prepared for baptism. The contracted chapel was to be given up entirely to school purposes, and a larger building was to be erected for the use of the new Fifth Ogove Church. The site selected for it was one particularly gratifying to me,—near Mrs. Nassau's grave. She had died, having seen little of the work of her hands. Now the Lord "establishes" it! Brother Allegret awaits the coming from France of an associate lady to enlarge Madame Allegret's Fang Girls' School. The advance to the Interior along the line of the Ogove Rapids is to be made shortly, the Paris Society seeing in the location of Talaguga the very advantages I had claimed for it twelve years ago. They accepted the transfer of it, and Kangeve for this very purpose of an advance declining at the same time to accept also our two Gaboon stations, as having no connection with that advance. That week's visit at Talaguga, in its realization of some of my dreams, and the strengthening of faith for the future, was a blessed, happy time!

Gaboon, West Africa. ROBERT H. NASSAU.

WHEN the Lord has a special work to be done, he never fails to supply the means for its accomplishment. The few contributions forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD three weeks ago by a band of its readers, to be applied as a Food Fund in relieving the sufferings of a few families among the thousands of distressed and destitute homes in New York, have been graciously multiplied, until these gifts flowing in upon us from all parts of the Union, have already reached a point which has made it possible for the Food Fund to supply one thousand poor, deserving families with the daily necessities of life. The blessed example of that Divine benevolence which, on the Galilean mountain-side, flung 5,000 with five barley loaves and two small fishes, has so inspired the generous Christian men and women of America, that they have multiplied the Food Fund's humble basket, until it is now satisfying the hunger of five thousand men, women, and children who, until this relief came, knew not where to look for a meal.

The week just closed has witnessed such an extension of the Fund's territory and operations as must be welcome news to those who have so generously contributed to its support. Instead of opening one new relief station on the East-side, as was proposed, eight new stations have been established. This has been accomplished by arrangement with the pastors of a number of Protestant churches of different denominations, all of which are located in parishes where the poor are greatly preponderate and the distress is most keenly felt. These new stations are as follows:

LOCATION.	FAMILIES FED.
No. 2, 103 Stanton Street (East Side),	100
No. 3, 214 Sullivan St. (West Side),	100
No. 4, 13 Jane Street (West Side),	100
No. 5, 545 E. Eleventh St. (East Side),	100
No. 6, 12 Oliver Street (East Side),	100
No. 7, 144 W. 68th Street, (West Side),	100
No. 8, 307 W. 18th Street, (West Side),	100
No. 9, 492 Second Avenue (East Side),	100

Making in all 800 families, or, with 200 families whose wants are already supplied at relief Station No. 1, a total of 1,000 families, averaging five persons in each, the whole aggregating 5,000 persons who are now recipients of the relief furnished through experienced in Christian work are now employed in visiting among the homes of the poor. This band is supplemented by the missionaries of the various churches whose pastors are co-operating with the Food Fund, and the spiritual results are thus far most encouraging. No opportunity to impress the lesson of God's care for his children is allowed to pass unimproved.

In many homes where poverty has prevented the parents or children from attending church or Sunday School, the gift of a few garments from the clothing supplies sent by friends of the Fund, has opened a way to the enjoyment of religious privi-

one week's supplies of groceries, to many of them bread, coal, oil and wood are furnished under the same coupon system as has already been introduced at Relief Station No. 1. The force of city missionaries employed as District Visitors by the Food Fund has also been increased and a number of ladies leges. In the next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we shall deal more in detail with the spiritual aspect of the work, which promises to be instrumental in bringing many souls into the Kingdom.

During the coming week, it is proposed to establish a Sewing Circle in connection with the Fund. A gentleman in Ephrata, Pa., has contributed six sewing machines and these will be operated by a number of sewing girls, now idle, who will make garments for distribution in connection with the Clothing Department of the Fund. All contributions should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund, Bible House, N. Y.

Some of the experiences of the District Visitors are most touching. In 17th Street, a woman was found whose baby simply had a table cover around her, and absolutely no other clothing in the house. An aged woman of seventy, who had supported her sick husband for eight years, came for help. Her husband had recently died, and her own work had given out. "I will soon follow him," said she, sadly, "and I shall only want help a very little while."

One of the families relieved consisted of a blind father and four children, the mother being sick at the hospital. In one of the tenement houses two women were found, one seventy-two years of age, hale and hearty, the other her daughter of thirty-five, dying of consumption. The mother, an American Protestant, had pawned a shawl which had been in the family 100 years, the last thing they could pawn. This kept them in food and coal for one week. The Fund paid the rent and supplied the patient with a few delicacies. As the missionary went out, the invalid said pleadingly: "Please come again to-morrow. You are like a ray of sunshine to me."

Four children, their mother and grandmother were found in one room and a closet in a rear house. They had but five cents worth of coal for the day, and the mother had seriously entertained thoughts of suicide. In this, as in many other instances, the Food Fund doubtless was the means of saving a life. The following contributions of clothing, have been received:

OUR "FOOD FUND'S" MISSION.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD congratulates its readers everywhere on their noble and self-sacrificing response to the appeal of the destitute poor of New York. While former experiences led us to anticipate a generous recognition of the call for aid, the result has exceeded our most hopeful anticipations. Through the liberality of our Christian friends, whose sympathies have been enlisted in the effort to help the thousands of worthy, afflicted families in the poverty-stricken sections of the metropolis, we are now enabled to supply food to ONE THOUSAND FAMILIES A DAY! This is an average of five thousand persons to whom, under Divine Providence, the subscribers to the Food Fund have become the daily almoners, during a season of unexampled hardship and distress.

We glory in the appreciation of the fact that it is not needed that we should have to remind our friends of their duty, in this time of very general suffering among the poor. Every mail brings us many letters, showing how quick and warm are their sympathies, how willing the hand they extend to help those in affliction, as though striving, in Christian emulation, for the blessing that comes to those who "consider the poor." What has already been accomplished by the Food Fund may seem insignificant, where so much distress remains, and must for many weeks still remain, unrelieved; but if the effort is made in the right spirit by each Christian household in this land to aid ONE FAMILY, the suffering during the remaining weeks of winter will be greatly reduced, if not altogether relieved. It is through such organized agencies as the Food Fund, where every dime and every dollar reach the mark, and not by indiscriminate charity, that the greatest good is to be accomplished.

FRESHNESS IN RELIGION.

RELIGION, instead of wearing out, is wearing in, and the world which once rejected it now begins to receive it, and all around the earth is heard the song of hosanna and congratulation. Look at this old Bible, composed under divine inspiration so long ago by the prophet, and the evangelist, and the apostle. If any other book in all the world had been half as much read as that book, it would have become a worn-out story, and been cast from the regard of men. No other book that the world has ever seen could endure so much reading and study without becoming stale and insipid, and positively disgusting. Yet after the studying of this book by the learned men of all ages, and after you have read it in the morning hour and in the evening hour for years and scores of years, and heard its truths preached Sabbath after Sabbath, and its passages quoted day after day, not only in religious books but in secular literature, it is as fresh and fair and beautiful as though Ezekiel had just written his prophecies, and Luke the Acts of the Apostles, and Paul his Epistle to Timothy. The promises new. The miracles new. The parables new. The historical portion of the Bible new. Never were there so many people studying it as there are studying it to-day. Never did it pour so much comfort and light and hope and peace upon the nations as it is pouring to-day. A lantern for every dark path. A light-house for every dangerous port. A soft pillow for every dying head

How precious is the Book Divine,
By inspiration given;
Bright as a lamp its doctrines shine,
To guide our souls to heaven.

So it is with the Lord Jesus Christ. He is an aged Christ. The Bible represents him as such when it says, "His hair is white like snow." And yet how attractive he is to our souls. We greet him in our homes. We hail him in our religious assemblages. Honored on earth, and praised in heaven. Light for all darkness. Bread for all hunger. Harbor for all storm. Life for all death.

Yes, the whole subject of heaven is old. You have been singing about it all your days, and talking about it, and praying about it, and hearing the subject discussed; and yet that theme has as much rapture for your soul as when, at your mother's knee, you first heard there was any such place as heaven. Though "a great multitude that no man can number" have been standing around about the throne of God, and hallelujahs have been going up through all the ages, you are yourself anticipating, with great rapture of soul, entrance upon that blessed rest; and the story, instead of becoming a worn-out and insipid story, becomes more and more thrilling by so much as you have trials and hardships and persecutions and temptations and sins.

We congratulate you that you have such a fresh religion, and, while you possess it yourselves, commend it to all the people. There are those who have not tasted one of its joys, nor wept one of its sorrows, nor felt the inspiration of one of its promises. Let us pray God that the religion of Jesus Christ may be made so glowingly attractive to all the world that men will step immediately into the kingdom of God, receiving Christ as their pardon and peace.

AN EVOLUTIONARY FABLE.

ONCE upon a time there was in a natural amphitheatre of the forest a convention of animals, and a gorilla from western Africa came in with his club and pounded "Order!" Then he sat down in a chair of twisted forest roots. The delegation of birds came in and took their position in the galleries of the hills and the tree-tops. And a delegation of reptiles came in, and they took their position in the pit of the valley. And the tiers of rocks were occupied by the delegation of intermediate animals; and there was a great aquarium and a canal leading into it, through which came the monsters of the deep to join the great convention. And on one table of rock there were four or five primal germs under a glass case, and in a cup on another table of rock there was a quantity of protoplasm.

Then this gorilla of the African forest, with his club, pounded again, "Order! order!" and then he cried out: "Oh, you great throng of beasts and birds and reptiles and insects, I have called you together to propose that we move up into the human race, and be beasts no longer; too long already have we been hunted and caged and harnessed; we shall stand it no longer." At that speech the whole convention broke out in roars of enthusiasm like as though there were many menageries being fed by their keepers, and it did seem as if the whole convention would march right up and take possession of the earth and the human race.

But an old lion arose, his mane white with many years, and he uttered his voice; and when that old lion uttered his voice, all the other beasts of the forest were still, and he said: "Peace, brothers and sisters of the forest. I think we have been placed in the spheres for which we were intended; I think our Creator knew the place that was good for us."

He could proceed no further, for the whole convention broke out in an uproar. And, lo! the parliament of wild beasts was prologue and went home to their constituents. Man in his place, the beasts of the earth in their places.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. W. Rapp, Dysart, Pa. Were the disciples converted before the day of Pentecost? Christ's work to Peter (Luke 22:32) appear to imply that conversion was then future.

The word "converted" in the passage which you refer would be more correctly rendered, "restored," or as the Revised Version has it, "turned again." Peter became a backslider, but was brought back. His conversion occurred before that. The descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost was not to convert the Apostles, but to give them power for the work before them.

D. L. Terrill, Underhill, Vt. Is a man who has experienced justification by faith a saved man? he commits sin afterward does he need the salvation process again?

He is a saved man if he has truly committed himself to Christ. The new divine life is implanted within him, which strives to keep him from sin. He becomes a child of God and if afterwards falls into sin and sincerely repent and goes to God for pardon, he is forgiven through Christ. (1. John 2:1.) His shame and sorrow are much greater than before his conversion, but he is received as a repentant sinner, not as a stranger and an enemy. Restoration what takes place then, not justification.

T. J. Faulkner, Perry, Fla. Does Heb. 11:1, teach that faith is the evidence itself? Is not faith belief in the evidence?

The passage says that faith is the substance of things hoped for, the proving or test (R.V.) of things not seen. That is, the assured conviction of their existence. The instances given farther on in the chapter show the sense in which the words are to be understood, as Abraham went to live in the land of promise assured that God would give it to his posterity. He who exercises faith, who relies on God's promise and trusts to it has proof in his own soul that it will be fulfilled. Thus faith becomes, brings, evidence.

B. D. Gatton, Mt. Vernon, Mo. 1. Is a Christian under obligation to give one-tenth of his income to the Lord? 2. What constitutes a tenth?

1. There is no command to that effect in the New Testament. The duty of giving, however is enjoined. Under the Old Testament the proportion was one-tenth, but the Christian's greater privileges would seem to suggest a larger proportion. It is left to his conscience. What does he owe to Christ? 2. There are many ways of reckoning it. One of the most reasonable is to deduct from the gross receipts the bare necessary cost of living and give a proportion of the balance. If the gross receipts are taxed, the proportion given by the poor is more onerous than that given by the rich.

Everett Peck, Polk, Wis. 1. Is the rainbow a supernatural phenomenon? 2. Were there rainbows before the flood?

1. No, it is natural, and is caused by the sunlight being reflected and refracted from falling drops of rain. The colors are separated as in a prism. 2. Some scientists hold that there was no rain before the flood, but that a dense cloud, the result of the evaporation from the earth, hid the face of the sun and a mist watered the earth. The general belief, however is that there was rain and therefore rainbows; but a new meaning was attached to them when God promised not to destroy the earth again by a flood and made the rainbow his sign to remind men of the promise.

Replying to Harlem Subscriber's letter in a recent issue:

S. Short, Amboy, Ohio, writes: "As Rev. Stephen Merritt feeds people for two-and-a-half cents a meal, Harlem Subscriber ought to be willing to give a meal or two at any rate, and if his surplus is any larger than it was last year, he ought to give more."

Miss E. A. Goddard, Norwich, Vt., writes: "I consider it my privilege to withdraw my trifle from the savings bank and place it in the bank of heaven as soon as I can get it, and ascertain to my satisfaction where it will be most useful. I know that many persons would say that I am trying to purchase my salvation by good works, but God knows I was saved long ago by the merits of the elder Brother."

W. H. W., Rogersville, O., writes: "If you are under no obligations to the past; if your present need admits of your devoting a part of your income to the relief of 'God's poor,' do not hesitate. The present necessity certainly should outweigh any possible claims of the future. You may never live to enjoy your O.A. and F. Fund; while thousands alive today are pinched and tormented for want of that relief, which it might bring. If you are a Christian they are your brothers in Christ, and can you hoard up wealth and comfort while your brother is a hungry and destitute on the street. Our Master bade him, who had two coats, give one to him who had none; and him who had food to do likewise. Your savings bank may make an assignment, your securities be devoured by quenchless flames. But lay up for yourself treasures in heaven."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

ENGLAND'S VETERAN STATESMAN

POLITICAL circles in England were agitated a few days ago by the announcement in an influential journal that Mr. Gladstone, the venerable head of the Government, intended to resign before the assembling of Parliament. The reasons given were that at the age of eighty-four he found the burdens of office oppressive, and that he was greatly discouraged by the rejection in the House of Lords of his two favorite measures. Two communications were evoked by the announcement. One was a statement which had been made last year by Sir Andrew Clark, Mr. Gladstone's physician, shortly before his death. The physician said that notwithstanding the statesman's advanced age, his extraordinary constitution showed no signs of a break down, and that he possessed "a well-preserved force of energy far beyond that of an ordinary man in the prime of life." Dr. Clark added that to Mr. Gladstone, "work was not exhausting, but acted upon him as a restorative," and that inactivity would tend to curtail rather than prolong his life. A more disquieting communication came from Mr. Gladstone himself. After denying the report that he had decided on resigning, but admitting that his age and the condition of his sight and hearing rendered relief from public affairs desirable, he said that he was "ignorant of the course which events important to the nation might take," and therefore he would do nothing to restrain his freedom as to the performance of the arduous duties which might lie before him and his colleagues. The phraseology of the letter was evidently cautious, and the public thought it ominous. There was a general impression that the events to which Mr. Gladstone referred as likely to involve arduous duties, must be menaces of war. No specially important events are known to be impending; but, if there was danger of war, Mr. Gladstone would know of that long before the general public, and might naturally write as he did. On this page we give a portrait of Mr. Gladstone taken from a sketch of him as he appears in his son's church at Hawarden, where it has long been his habit when Parliament is not sitting, to attend daily prayers and read the lessons. Throughout his long career, Mr. Gladstone's unaffected piety has endeared him to religious people. Perhaps, the phenomenon of his extraordinary vigor, to which his physician referred may not be all accounted for on physical grounds. We read that they who wait on the Lord renew their strength. (Isa. 40: 31.)

A Deferred Wedding.

Toronto newspapers published recently a marriage notice which has a remarkable history connected with it. A young lady in Birmingham, England, was visiting the family of a manufacturer, and noticed on the library table a business letter bearing a Canadian post-mark. The address was in handwriting very similar to that of a young man to whom she had been engaged fourteen years before. Some misunderstanding had caused a separation, and she had lost sight of him. She asked her host the name of the writer, and, finding that the letter did come from her former lover, she asked other questions and altogether displayed so much interest that when the manufacturer wrote to his Canadian correspondent, he mentioned the incident and the lady's name, saying how much interest his business letter had aroused. The young man, who had, after many painful experiences, found lucrative employment in Canada, thus learned that the lady was still unmarried and had not forgotten him, so he wrote to her, and after some correspondence, as he could not leave his business to visit her, the lady crossed the ocean and they were married. If they find that in the troubles of life their companionship is mutually helpful to them, they will regret that during the past fourteen years they were without it. Such regret, with infinitely greater cause, those Christians feel who enter late in life into union with Christ. It is often found that they promised themselves to him in their youth, but were alienated from him by some cherished sin. Then they mourn that the joy and blessedness they enjoy had not been theirs during their whole lives. (Eccles. 12: 1.)

A Life Sacrificed.

A distressing fatality occurred at a ferry in Jersey City, N. J., on Feb. 2. Two brothers whose home is at Ridgewood, N. J., went to the ferry-house to go to their business in New York. The train by which they travelled was late, and when they reached the ferry house the boat was already starting. They ran through, however, eluding the gate-keeper, who tried to stop them, and reached the edge of the slip when the stern of the boat was several feet from the float. The elder of the brothers jumped instantly and landed safely on the boat. The younger hesitated a moment, as if doubting his ability to reach it and then sprang. But in that moment the gap between the boat and the slip had increased and he missed the boat and fell into the river. His elder brother saw him fall and, throwing off his coat jumped after him. He was an expert swimmer, but the water seemed to chill him, for he was unable to make a stroke and sank without reaching his brother. The younger brother continued to struggle in the water and was drawn out with a rope by the ferry hands, but his brother never rose again. The elder was twenty-five years old and the younger, twenty-one. The young man who was saved will never cease to lament that unhappy morning when he and his brother despised the gate-keeper's warning. Infinitely deeper will be the regret of those who die in their sins that they did not heed the warnings of God's servants who beseech them not to imperil their souls. (II. Cor. 5: 20.)

A Morphine Antidote.

Physicians who have been called to treat patients who have accidentally or purposely taken a large dose of morphine are aware that it is extremely difficult to save their lives. They usually sink into a state of coma, from which they are not easily aroused and they generally die of heart failure. The usual course is to administer coffee and stimulants, to apply galvanism or the electric-brush, and to force the patient to continuous exercise to prevent his going to sleep. The number of cases has rapidly increased of late, owing to the prevalence of the morphine habit and the fact has stimulated physicians to seek an antidote. One has at last been found, which Dr. William Moor, of the German Clinic of New York, declares, after a personal test, to be effective. It is permanganate of Potassium, in doses of one and a half times the quantity of the morphine taken. The tests were made first on dogs and as they were invariably successful, the doctor himself took a fatal dose of morphine and afterward the proportionate dose of the antidote. As in the case of the dogs, the antidote quickly and completely neutralized the effects of the poison. The discovery will probably be the means of saving many lives. That is the function of an antidote; it would be a still greater blessing, however, if it took away the craving for the poison, so that an habitue whose life is saved had no desire for the poison afterward. This is the power that is the glory of God's antidote to the poison of sin. He who is truly saved by Christ's power loathes sin and does not willingly return to its bondage. (Rom. 6: 22.)

A Shrinkage of Values.

A remarkable purchase is reported by the "St. Louis Republic." It was made at the auction sale under foreclosure of a town in Alabama. The property consisted of thirty thousand acres of land said to contain minerals, two thousand town lots, and various hotels and factories. About five years ago a company was formed to purchase the land and the shares were largely sold in New England. Fully five million dollars were invested privately and by the shareholders. Furnaces, rolling mills and factories were erected and hotels built. A town sprang up rapidly and for a time the prospects were good. But a sudden depression came in the fall of 1890 and more money was needed. A blanket mortgage of three hundred thousand dollars was secured, but it failed to save the town. The mortgage has been foreclosed and the whole property has been sold at auction. The highest price offered was sixty thousand dollars and for that sum the whole property in which five million dollars had been invested was sold. A change of circumstances and conditions had occurred which had affected the value of the property. Men who toil and save to build up a fortune, sometimes sacrificing their souls in the effort, often forget that a much greater change must inevitably occur when all that they now prize so highly will be utterly worthless to them. (James 5: 2, 3.)

Double Restitution.

Secretary Carlisle recently acknowledged the receipt of twenty-five hundred dollars which had been remitted to him under pecu-

BRIEF NOTES.

Evangelists Read and Chafer have been conducting successful evangelistic meetings at Akron, O. One church has already received an addition of fifty members.

David Ames, a relative of Bishop Ames, died at Jerseyville, Ill., lately, in his one hundred and second year. He had never known a day's illness in all his life. He had been a member of the Methodist Church seventy-nine years.

Through the Kindness of a Friend of the Fallen in New York, each of the 1100 inmates of the various penal institutions on Blackwell's Island, New York, has been given a copy of the Bible. It is worthy of note that men of every creed and men of no creed accepted the gift gratefully.

More than 100,000 lives were saved in China during the recent famine, by the Famine Relief Fund, provided by Christian people, and distributed largely by the missionaries. It is said that 1,000 persons were converted, whose attention was first drawn to the Gospel by seeing this good work.

A Korean Student has entered Roanoke College, Salem, Va. It has had Japanese, Mexican and Indian students, but this is the first from the "Hermit Nation." He was recommended by the ex-Secretary of the Korean Legation in Washington who has been converted to Christianity. The new student's name is Suh Bennis Kin.

The influence of female suffrage in the purification of politics is seen in New Zealand. An influential journal says: "Every woman over twenty-one years of age was entitled to vote at the last New Zealand election, and it was observed that wherever there was a candidate whose morals were of a dubious standard, they invariably voted against him."

Rev. B. Fay Mills has been holding Special services at Princeton, N. J. Several services were held in the College Chapel and Murray Hall. Many students attended and there were some remarkable conversions. A particularly hopeful feature of the mission was the number of Christian students who sought a fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit and consecrated themselves anew to Christ's work.

The large number of converts at the Moody and Sankey meetings in Providence, R. I., prompted a minister to ask a brother minister standing near him whether he thought they would remain faithful. In reply the minister, speaking of his own experience, said: "I have in my church several excellent members who trace their conversion under God to Mr. Moody's ministrations there some 20 years ago."

A Historian Examining a Quantity of old documents found the following copy of an Act of Parliament passed in the reign of King Henry V., who reigned from 1413 to 1422: "Whosoever they were that should read the Scriptures in the mother tongue, they should forfeit land, catel, lit, and godes, from theyre hevers, for ever; and be condemned for heretykes to God, enemies to the crowne, and arrant traitors to the lande."

Major D. W. Whittle has Unhappily Met with a serious accident. He was conducting a series of meetings at Newport, R. I. On Jan. 29, while on his way home from one of the meetings, he slipped on the ice and fell backward. The back of his head struck the ice with great force and he was rendered insensible. He is now recovering, but his physician imperatively forbids his continuing his work and orders him to refrain for some time from reading and writing.

A new Saint is mentioned by the "Congregationalist." Through the generous efforts of Mr. Collins of Newark, N. J., a church has been built in a needy district in the South, where there is a large colored population. The church, which is under the auspices of the American Missionary Association, has done valuable work among the people. As a mark of their gratitude, without consulting any of their Northern friends, they have called their organization "St. Collins Church."

Mr. Quinn the Anti-gambling Evangelist has been traveling through New Jersey and New York during the last three months, staying some time in Buffalo, Elmira, Wilkesbarre, Mauch Chunk and Bethlehem, holding meetings in his railroad car, in churches and Y. M. C. A. Buildings. In Elmira a man who had been a gambler for fifty years was converted. He was over seventy years old. His prayer that God would save him for the sake of his children, was very pathetic. Nearly half of the cost of the car has been raised.

The Evangelistic Campaign in Brooklyn, N. Y., which was inaugurated by Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., has extended rapidly under the charge of Dr. Gregg and the committee of ministers. Among the evangelists who have been laboring in the various churches are Rev. George C. Needham and Mrs. Needham, Rev. John F. Carson, Rev. Will McNeill, Rev. Arthur Crane, Messrs. Hunter and Crossley, and Mr. Leonard Weaver. The revival has been helped by the singing of Mrs. M. E. Willson, the sister of the late Mr. P. P. Bliss, Mr. Louis Armstrong and the Creole quartette. Mr. Moody spent Feb. 6th in Brooklyn, while on his way to Washington and preached at Dr. Gregg's church, and Dr. Dixon's church, and held an inquiry meeting.

THE DIVINE TEST.

Sermon Preached in the First Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga., by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D.D. Text: 1. Thess. 5: 21, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

THIS precept is applicable to everything in philosophy, science, literature, social life, government and religion. We cannot afford to hold on to and burden our lives with anything that is false and hurtful. God made us to search out, believe and practice only what is good. He makes it our duty to investigate the past, and preserve what it produced or discovered that is true and helpful to mankind, and transmit it to posterity. A thing is not necessarily false and worthless because it is old. Sun and moon, and stars, and earth, and air, and water are old, but they are just as real and useful now as when God made them and pronounced them good. Nor should we reject a thing because it is new. There was a time when the best things in our civilization were new. How sad our condition today if these things had been repudiated, upon the principle that "whatever is new is not true." Each generation should gather from the past all that is true and wise, and beautiful and good, and hand it over to the next generation. But it should do more than this. It should add to the treasures gathered from the past, treasures of its own discovery or creation. To advance the world in truth, righteousness and happiness, we must destroy, and conserve, and originate. There are false customs and institutions among us that have their roots in the distant past. They are hoary and venerable with age. But seeing that they were founded in misconception and error, we owe it to God, ourselves, and the generation that shall follow us, to overthrow and destroy them. There are other customs and institutions, born in that remote past, which have stood the test of reason, and revelation, and experience. These we should preserve, and foster, and magnify.

The True Reformer.

The man who "proves all things and holds fast all that which is good," is a reformer. The ideal man in any age or country, is a reformer. He is overturning the false and the bad, and establishes the true and the good. There are some reformers, so-called, who are only destructionists. They would completely dis sever the past from the present. They would consign to oblivion all that former generations believed and practiced, and build new systems on new foundations and with new materials. Descartes, centuries ago, did a work which cannot be repudiated without shattering the whole structure of modern philosophy. He doubted until he reached the point where he could doubt no longer. He could not doubt that he doubted. Here was an indisputable fact—he thought. With that he began his philosophy. "I think, therefore I am." I was not always, "I began to be." This compels me to think of a being that caused me. The being that caused me must himself be uncaused. Moreover, there could not be an uncaused cause without an effect. Creation, then, with which I stand face to face, was the effect of the great first cause. By this method Descartes demonstrated three realities—himself, God and Creation. The man who attempts to reform philosophy, or to build a new system, without accepting Descartes' work, must utterly fail. No sane man would attempt to reconstruct science without accepting the great facts of nature, uncovered by such men as Galileo, Newton and Kepler. There are some things that will stand no matter what progress the world makes. Gravitation, heat and electricity will be realities a hundred million of years hence, if the world should last that long. Then it will be as true as now, that the world revolves upon its axis, and that the planets have their orbits around the sun.

On the sacred ground of religion we find reformers, so-called, who would bury the Old Testament, and eliminate from Christianity all that is true and helpful, everything that belonged to the Patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations. But we cannot dis sever Christianity from those dispensations without giving up its most essential truths. These three dispensations are inseparably linked together, making a complete system of revealed truth. The Mosaic dispensation succeeded the Patriarchal, but it did not abolish any of its doctrines, precepts, or prophecies. The Patriarchs taught the personality, unity, and universality of God; and so did Moses. They taught men the duty of absolute obedience to Jehovah's will; and so did Moses. They appointed sacrifices, pointing to the Messiah and his death upon the Cross; and so did Moses. They also instructed the people to prepare themselves for a heavenly country—a home with God in another and a better world; and so did Moses. There was much in the Mosaic period that was new. There were many new statutes and new sacrifices, and new modes of worship. But the old precepts and prophecies were incorporated with all that was new, and preserved as a sacred heritage to be transmitted to coming generations.

The Linked Dispensations.

After Moses and the Prophets came Christ, who established another dispensation, not by abolishing the law and the Prophets, but by fulfilling them. The types and symbols instituted by Moses disappeared, not because they were wrong, but because the things they foreshadowed had come to pass. All that was in the Law written upon tables of stone, and all that was signified by the elaborate ritual of Synagogue and Temple, is preserved and magnified in the Gospel and Kingdom of Jesus Christ. In this trinity of dispensations there is a sublime unity. They cannot be separated. They must stand or fall together. He who rejects one rejects them all, for they three are one.

"Prove all things." This includes the Bible. God is willing to have his Word put upon trial. He is not only willing but he challenges investigation. We may prove the Bible by an honest and intelligent examination both of the external and internal evidences of its divinity. We may prove it as we prove air, and water, and food. It claims to be as useful to our moral natures as these material things are to our bodies. Any man may test this claim by an application of the revelations and precepts of the Bible to the wants of his own soul. The questions propounded to Simonides are the same questions which rise unbidden in the breast of every rational human being. "Who is God? Where is he? What is he?" The Bible gives the only answer to these questions that can satisfy the human mind and soul. It tells us that God is a spirit-invisible, eternal, omnipotent, almighty, omnipresent, infinite in wisdom, holiness, justice, goodness, love and mercy. We prove the truth of this answer whenever we try to add anything to it. The more we think about it, the more we feel and see the completeness of it.

How to Know God's Will.

But we need more than a knowledge of God's being and attributes. As his creatures and upheld by his hand, we instinctively feel that we ought to obey his will. But what is his will? The Bible claims to be a revelation of it. Can I know that it is God's will? Yes. How? By obeying it. No man ever tried it without being constrained to say, "I have found the wisdom and the will of the living God." Standing before the revelation of God's character we will see our own imperfection and unholiness. We see that we are violators of Divine law. Conscious of our guilt and condemnation, we feel our separation from God, and our exposure to his righteous wrath. This makes another problem. How shall we escape the penalty for our disobedience? How can we get forgiveness for our sins? How can we be freed from guilt, and the pangs of an awakened conscience. With fear and trembling, we cry out in the language of the convicted jailer, "What must I do to be saved?" The Bible answers, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." It tells us how he who knew no sin was made sin for us, how he bore our sins in his own body on the tree, how he is exalted to give repentance and remission of sins, and how, by believing, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

By a very practical, simple, speedy, and certain method, we may test these doctrines, and determine whether they are True or False.

"Come and see." Come with your burdened, guilty, aching conscience, and fall at the feet of him who said, "Look unto me all ye ends of the earth and be saved," and you will feel the touch of his redeeming might, and know, in your secret soul, "that he hath power on earth to forgive sins." With the hand of faith resting on him, you will experience a quickening and resurrection within you, an opening of faculties hitherto dormant, and a taste of that infinite calm which only God can bestow.

Peter having trusted and followed Jesus, was able to say, "Thou art the Christ—the Son of the living God." Paul having believed on him and obeyed him, could say, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." To the man who has personally tested the Gospel, God, and Christ, and salvation are as real as his own existence. It is the knowledge of these realities that makes the Christian peaceful in adversity and joyful in tribulation. It was this knowledge that inspired Henry Martyn to say in his last sickness: "Weakness, peril, and pain are but the ministering angels, commissioned of God, to conduct me to glory unspeakable and eternal." It was this knowledge that moved the learned and renowned Joseph Addison, on his death bed, to say to the sceptical and dissipated Warwick, "I have sent for you that you may see in what peace a Christian can die." It was this knowledge that sustained the great and good Dr. Watts, when he wrote, "I thank God that I can lie down at night without the least solicitude as to whether I shall wake in this world or the next." It was this knowledge of things invisible to mortal sense, that gave the joy of assurance to that old Scotch preacher who died with the Bible open before him, and with his finger resting on those of Paul, "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." It was this knowledge that made Florence Foster say, as her eyes were closing in death, "I am walking in a valley, but the mountain tops are gleaming from peak to peak."

If we have proved the Bible and found it to be true, let us stand by it, cling to it, magnify it, and in our thoughts and affections exalt it immeasurably above all other books. Believing the Bible to be divine and infallible, let us subject all things to the light of its teachings, and condemn and repudiate everything that is opposed either to the principles or the spirit of it.

Tried by this book, what becomes of the philosophy of Herbert Spencer which declares that the First Cause is "unknown and unknowable." It "in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth!" it from age to age he spoke to the world through such men as Enoch and Noah, and Abraham and Moses and Elijah and Daniel and Isaiah; and if he was incarnated in that wonderful man who said, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," he is not the unknown or unknowable.

Tried by this book, what becomes of Unitarianism, which declares that Jesus was only a man? If we believe the Scripture which says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us," how can we countenance Unitarianism without contradicting our faith and betraying the Master to whom we have pledged unflinching fealty?

Looking at it in the light of this infallible book, what shall we say of Universalism, which denies the future punishment of the wicked? If you believe that our divine Lord spoke the truth when he taught that there will come a day when he will judge the world, and condemn the wicked to everlasting punishment, you cannot be a loyal subject to his kingdom and have any fellowship with Universalism.

How can any believer in the Bible look with any degree of favor upon Christian Science, so-called—that last born and most absurd of all the isms, and which declares that nothing exists but God, and that as God is good and only good, there can be no such thing as sin, or sickness, or pain or death? No sane man can believe the Bible and have any sympathy with such unmitigated heresy and nonsense. If Christian Science be true the Bible is the worst book in the universe. From beginning to end it is a deception—an imposition upon human ignorance and credulity. But if the Bible be true, nothing on earth, under the earth, or above the earth is less true than Christian Science—so-called.

I do not question the sincerity and the good intentions of the unfortunate people who cling to this delusion. Neither do I doubt the sincerity and of thousands of people who are confined in lunatic asylums. Guitau, the religious crank, who declared that God had told him to kill President Garfield, was just as sincere as the deluded Boston woman and her infatuated followers, who imagine that they can convince the world that the Bible, rightly interpreted, means there is nothing in the universe but God, and that sin, disease, suffering, and death are unreal. It is not sincerity but truth that makes us God's freemen. If we would prove all things by the principles and spirit of this infallible standard what should be our judgment of certain institutions which have entrenched themselves in the midst of our civilization? If we should be loyal to the teaching of this Sacred Volume, which requires us to lay the axe to the root of the trees, and cut down every tree that bringeth forth evil fruit, what would become of those theatres and operas, where multitudes of people gather night after night, merely for the vulgar gratification of looking upon human nudity? And what would be done with the newspapers which expose to larger multitudes pictures of these nude creatures, who for a few dollars have parted with honor, virtue, and decency?

Guided by the teachings and spirit of the Bible, what should be our judgment of some of these city clubs, at whose magnificent rooms hundreds of men spend the Lord's Day in drinking, playing cards, and discussing politics, horse races, and prize-fights?

Guided by the same book, what should be our judgment of that great pet and idol of American politicians—the Bar-room? What fruit has this tree borne? Every vice and crime and sorrow under the sun. By the same standard we should prove men, and elevate to places of honor and authority, only such as can abide the test. It is a fact which excites the admiration of virtuous people in every quarter of this great Republic, that for many years, the three highest offices within the gift of this old Christian Commonwealth of Georgia, have been entrusted to men who love and obeyed the wisdom and requirements of this Book. And I rejoice to say that the present prospect is that these exalted positions will be occupied for the next term by men, who, in this respect will be the equals of their noble predecessors. May God hasten the day when the people of this nation will cling to and honor with their suffrages, only such men as have proved loyal to his truth.

A Personal Test.

In concluding this discussion, let me say that the most practical thing that each one of us can do is to prove himself. Sit down in the quietness of your closet to-day, with the Bible open before you, and in the light of God's eternal truth see yourself. The most practical method of self-examination is to compare yourself with that Man of men—the One altogether lovely—the Lord Jesus Christ. A young artist paints a Madonna, and then he goes to some art gallery and compares it with Raphael's immortal work. Looking at the great masterpiece of the world's greatest painter, and then at his own work, he is made profoundly and painfully conscious of his imperfections. In the four Gospels you have spread out before you the immaculate life of Jesus Christ. Look at that life, and then look up thine own, and thou shalt see how much thou lackest. Some of you have not the courage to do this. Many are afraid to see and know hat manner of men they are. They shrink from the agony that such a knowledge could beget within their guilty souls. But the wisest thing that you can do is to prove yourself, and find out what you are in God's sight, and what are your prospects for a continuance of blessedness in the unending years that lie beyond the grave.

Prove yourself and if you find that you have built on the sand, correct yourself before the tempest of Judgment comes to sweep into everlasting darkness and horror all that is deceitful and false. Stand by the Cross of Christ, and on the solid and immutable foundation of his atoning work. All other ground is sinking sand. Hold fast to his example, and let your life be a perpetual growth towards his own perfect beauty. Do these things and thou shalt never be moved. Thou shalt dwell in peace, and "the Lord thy God shall be thine everlasting light."

BAPTIST WORK IN BURMAH.

This land, the scene of the labors of the painted Judson, must always be a land of tender associations for the Baptist Church. It is gratifying to learn that progress is being made there. Rev. F. H. Eveleth writes from Sandoway: We are now engaged in making our annual visits to all the villages in these regions, and hope soon to launch out into the depths of darker heathenism in the jungles of Arakan. Pray that divine power and protection may attend us. I have enjoyed the privilege of baptizing three Chins, a Karen, and a Burman from Miss Carr's school; also a well-to-do Arakanese merchant from Gyaing-gauk. The latter related how wonderfully the way had been opened to him to unite with a Christian church. He had believed the gospel of Christ for more than two years, but as his wife and his father had opposed his making public profession of his faith he had refrained. They were both dead and he being alone in the world came to receive baptism. The villagers had tried hard to prevent his professing Christ, but this he has been able to disregard, and his various experiences have made him a ripe Christian. He walked seventy-five miles to receive baptism.

This rainy season's work has been the most satisfactory that I have ever been permitted to do. My class and general work have so completely filled up the time, that I have no spare moments to waste in contemplating the possible intencities of my environments. The preachers' class roll shows thirty-nine names, three of whom were Chin young women who have graduated from our town mission school. About two-thirds of the men were also Chins, the remaining one third being Burmans and Arakanese. This work was continued without interruption five months. Other missionaries wrote in the same hopeful strain.

NOT KNOWING.

Not knowing the things that shall befall me Acts 20: 22.

I KNOW not what shall befall me,
God hangs a mist o'er my eyes;
And at each step of my onward path,
He makes new scenes to rise;
And every joy he sends me, comes
As a sweet and glad surprise.

For perhaps the dreaded future
Is less bitter than I think;
The Lord may sweeten the waters
Before I stoop to drink.
O, if Marah must be Marah,
He will stand beside its brink.

So I go on, not knowing,
I would not if I might;
I would rather walk in the dark with God,
Than go alone in the light;
I would rather walk with him by faith,
Than walk alone by sight.

My heart shrinks back from trials
Which the future may disclose,
Yet I never had a sorrow,
But what the dear Lord chose;

So I send the coming tears back
With the whispered word, "He knows."

JUST OBEY.

DO as you are told to do
By those wiser far than you;
Do not say:
"What the use of this may be
I am sure I cannot see;"
Just obey!

Do not sulk and do not sigh;
Though it seem in vain to try.
Work away!
All the ends you cannot see.
Do your duty faithfully,
Just obey!

When at length you come to know
Why 'twas ordered thus and so,
You will say:
"Glad am I that when to me
All was dark as dark could be,
I could trust, and faithfully
Just obey!"

THE FINAL SCENE.

The Last Vision in Revelation when Time Merges into Eternity.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE

THE end comes! The triumph of justice and righteousness! Creation prepared for the reign of eternal peace and harmony. The grand conclusion of the Messiah's meditation is shown us; this world a ransomed world, and man a ransomed race; confidence restored and established through the wide ranges of creation; all united in fidelity and devotion under the headship of the Son of Man; and—the commission assigned him as Mediator between the God-head and the creation being thus fulfilled and complete—what remains? That one Great Action which is to come and consummate the whole! The end is come! The Son of Man renders up to the Divine Father a re-united and re-established universe; that so, henceforth and forever, through ages that never darken and never close, the Godhead and the creation may live in immediate union and communion; needing no Mediator and no mediation; the entire reconciled creation within the arms of the Godhead; resting in the freedom of his unveiled presence; in the warmth of his divine love; in the brightness of his divine joy; strong in the strength of God; pure in the purity of God. Then, also, the Son resumes his primal position within the God-head, that "God may be all in all."

This final action of the Christ does not enter with any vivid representation into the prophetic vision of John, but he hears the voice of "Him that sitteth on the Throne" declare aloud:—"It is done; I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end" (Rev. 21: 6). He hears the same voice proclaim:—"Behold! I make all things new;" "and I saw," John says, "heaven new and earth new." There is now, by the immediate fiat of the Almighty Father, a renovation, but, in the essential features of this old world, no change; a heaven forever, this heaven made new; an earth forever, this earth made new.

This ransomed world, being thus renewed and made ready for the Throne of God and for the residence of a race redeemed, John sees a great city descending from its Creator, the New Jerusalem; that city promised and long expected; the city for which the "father of the faithful" looked, while living a stranger here; "the city which hath the foundations;" the twelve foundations of precious stones; "whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. 11: 10; Rev. 21: 19, 20.) It is of celestial origin; the mansion built by God for the eternal residence of the Bride. He is not ashamed to be called her Father, for "He hath prepared this majestic city for her." (Heb. 11: 16.) For the last thousand years she has dwelt in it as the Bride of the Lamb; and, as it now descends to this renovated world, a great excitement is moving the heaven. John is summoned by one of the chief angels to view the sight. "There came to me," he says, "one of the seven angels which had the seven vials laden with the seven last plagues, and he spake with me, saying, 'Come hither, I will shew thee the Bride, the wife of the Lamb;' and he carried me away in the spirit to a mountain great and high, and shewed me the Holy Jerusalem coming down out of heaven from God"—bright, rich, radiant—"like a Bride adorned for her husband" (21: 9, 10, 12); the glorious equipage, the state and majesty in which the Bride descends; this her lasting home; the palace and dwelling of the Queen. It is vast in its dimensions; metropolis of the ransomed and risen world.

The city is the palace and residence of the Bride; and God—her God and Father—is to be revealed within it. "I heard," says the prophet, "a great voice out of heaven saying, 'Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men; and he will dwell with them, and they will be his people; and God himself shall be with them; and be their God.'" "It hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine upon it, for the glory of God shall lighten it; and the lamp thereof is the Lamb; and the nations of them which are saved shall walk amidst the light of it." Access direct to the God who tabernacles in it and to his Throne will at all times be free to them. Its twelve gates, that face the four quarters of the earth, are never closed. "The kings of the earth shall bring the glory and the honor of the nations into it; and there shall in no wise enter it anything unclean, nor that doeth abomination and falsehood."

THE BEST GIFTS TO GOD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Feb. 25, Mark 12: 28-33; 41-44.

MOTIVES and other considerations, apart from intrinsic worth, have to be taken into account in making a just estimate of the value of a gift. Every man realizes this in his own case. He may receive a gift from a person to whom he has rendered a service, and be hurt and humiliated by it, because he understands that the donor does not wish to be under an obligation to him. A story is told of a poor young man, who after risking his life to save the girl he loved from drowning, refused the gift of a thousand dollars from her father. Although sorely needing the money, he regarded the gift, under the circumstances, as an insult. Or a gift may come from one who expects to receive a more valuable one in return. Or it may be in the nature of a bribe from one who hopes to benefit from dereliction of duty on the part of the recipient—like one by a saloon-keeper to a policeman, or of a suitor to a judge. Or it may be given by one who desires to pose as a patron, and will boast of it. Such a gift as Abraham refused from the King of Sodom, lest he should say, "I have made Abraham rich." The wealth of the donor is also an element in the estimate. The gift of a child who has saved his pocket money for weeks to buy it, or of a poor man who has toiled and denied himself that he may make the offering, or of one who has given time and effort to a search for some particular gift that would be of special value to his friend—any of these would appeal to the recipient's heart much more than the more costly gift of a millionaire who perhaps simply handed a bill to his servant and told him to go and buy some present for such and such a person. The real value of a gift seems to be in what it represents. If it is an expression of affection or the result of self-denial—if the recipient sees in it the heart's love of the giver, then both giver and receiver are drawn nearer together by the gift, and it is valued as a pledge or token, of a value with which its intrinsic cost has nothing to do. All that is revealed to us of God's relations with us indicates that he has the same estimate of our offerings. It is to the heart that he looks. There was no need that Abraham should kill his son when God saw that the patriarch would not withhold anything from him. The widow who cast two mites into the treasury gave more than the rich givers, because her gift cost her more than theirs cost them. The best, therefore, that we can give to God, like the best we can give to our fellow-man, is the supreme love which prompts our gifts, the love that thinks nothing of sacrifice, or toil, or effort in the service of its object. The smallest gift and the smallest service is consecrated by such love and is accepted of God and man, while greater gifts and brilliant services in which love does not speak, lacking the essential element, are rejected.

PRESIDENT CHAPMAN IN THE WEST.

The President of the Baptist Young People's Union is receiving a warm welcome in the Western cities on his tour of which we published a programme recently. His addresses are stimulating and invigorating, and are brightened with touches of humor.

At Helena, Mont., he made a vigorous defence, first, of young people's societies in general, and then of the denominational union individually. On the latter subject he disclaimed antagonism to the Christian Endeavor Society, and also a desire to dictate to the young people of any church the name they should bear, but he held that there was need of denominational union. In illustration of his contention, he mentioned an instance of a young lady in Chicago who had become a Methodist through association with Methodist young people in a choir. He said: "We are not here to pull down any standard, but to raise one of our own. We have a standard upon which is emblazoned principles that we believe are of vital importance, principles that have cost our fathers a sea of blood, principles that Baptists have always upheld before the world. We propose to keep that standard where our young people can see it, and we desire that they should learn to love it and to be proud of all that it means to us and them. We desire that once a year all our young people should meet as Baptists, where we can teach them to take an interest in

The Association has 410 members, who find here a commodious and well-arranged meeting-place, with a gymnasium, library, reading-room and all the appliances necessary for Association work. Three educational branches are conducted there, and the social department is not neglected, but the chief feature is the religious meetings. The Bible classes and devotional meetings have an average attendance of eighty, and much good has resulted from them. A flourishing Boy's Auxiliary is connected with the Association. It has eighty-five members and has regular meetings. A room in the building is set apart for their exclusive use.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR AFTER THIRTEEN YEARS.

Writing on February 2 to the editor of this journal, Dr. F. E. Clark says: On this thirteenth birthday of the Christian Endeavor movement, your readers may like to know something of the progress of the work during the past year. I think it can be truthfully said that the last twelve months has been the best year in all our history. More societies have been formed than in any previous twelve months; the Junior work has had a very large extension, and special efforts for sailors and soldiers, for life-saving stations and for traveling men have been prospered.

There are now in all the world about 30,000 societies with nearly 1,700,000 members. In other lands than ours have Endeavor principles taken deep root. In England the societies have more than doubled; there being now over 1,000. In Australia there are nearly that number, and national organizations for both these countries have been effected.

In Japan and China there are also na-of Christian young people, that their wide fellowship may grow yet wider, and that their abounding energies may all be devoted to Christ and his church.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Some Baptist Young People's Societies are supplying the church cupboards by holding a social, the price of admission being a plate or a cup and saucer.

President Chapman of the Baptist Young People's Union received a warm welcome at Spokane, Wash. He gave two addresses in halls in different quarters of the city. In both cases the buildings were crowded to their utmost capacity.

The Elmira, N. Y., Young Men's Christian Association has opened a restaurant on the plan of furnishing lunches at five, seven and ten cents, respectively. The lunches are said to be patronized largely by lawyers, ministers, clerks, merchants and a few laboring men.

The fourteen branches of the New York Young Men's Christian Association held an aggregate of 5218 religious services last year. The total attendance was 219,893. The Association owns seven buildings of an aggregate value of $1,310,000 on which there are debts amounting to $149,000.

A Christian Endeavor Society of Australia holds a social meeting once a month to which the members bring delicacies, fruits and flowers. Each member lays his gift on a large table provided for the purpose and on the following day, a city missionary, supported by the Society, carries the gifts to the poor and the sick in the home or the hospital.

At a convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies of Jamaica, West Indies, recently held at Kingston, every evangelical church was represented. One of the delegates walked fifty miles over the mountains to attend it.

The chapel of the Memorial Church of the Disciples of Christ in Salt Lake City, Utah, has been completed and formally dedicated. The funds were contributed by Christian Endeavor Societies in many States. The Church has 150 members and a flourishing C. E. Society.

An effort is being made by the King's Daughters to establish an office in Brooklyn, N. Y., for a centre of operations. The circles have been organized into a city union and a small contrivance from each would suffice for the cost of a local headquarters.

Rev. George Dana, Boardman, D. D., Pastor of the first Baptist Church, Philadelphia, writes: "I believe in the interdenominational features of the Christian Endeavor movement, for the simple reason that they are interdenominational. The kingdom of God is larger than any one denomination or all denomination put together." If this view were more general there would not be so much waste of energy and money as now.

Dr. Vedder the Editor of the "Baptist Review" gives the following reasons for preferring an interdenominational society of young people to a denominational one: The interdenominational features of Christian Endeavor I prize very highly. A Baptist, loyal in every fibre to the distinctive principles of my denomination, and proud of its history, I love all that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and in truth, and am glad of every opportunity of meeting with them and of joining them in all good works. There is little danger that any of us will forget that he belongs to a church: there is much danger that all of us will forget that we belong to the church, the fellowship of all true believers throughout the world. I believe in my own church, and am loyal to it; I believe in the holy Catholic church not less loyally.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDING, NEWBURYPORT, MASS.

Baptist doings and where our denominational undertakings may be laid before them. God grant that the young people of our beloved denomination may grasp our standard and, moving forward in the front of the battle, be found faithfully serving when the Redeemer shall come." Mr. Chapman's tour will probably result in a large increase in the number of unions, as well as in building up those already organized. The other Departments would be benefited by a visit from him.

A MASSACHUSETTS Y. M. C. A.

The home of the Young Men's Christian Association at Newburyport, Mass., a picture of which appears on this page, is an instance of noble munificence. It is the result of a gift of $40,000 which Mrs. George H. Corliss and family made a few years ago to the Association. The Association was organized in 1874, but as the town has little more than 15,000 inhabitants, there was not much probability of money being raised to build so handsome a home for the institution. Mrs. Corliss' gift, however, made this possible, and she must feel gratified to see how thoroughly it is appreciated.

tional societies of Christian Endeavor and encouraging news comes in every mail. In India the constitution and other literature has been translated into not less than half a dozen languages, while in Madagascar, Samoa, and in parts of Persia, Turkey and South Africa the work is also flourishing.

Most gratifying of all is the fact that the various evangelical denominations are cultivating more and more fully the Endeavor principles, and the Society is coming to be accepted every month more widely as the young people's society of the world.

In lines of Christian citizenship, American Endeavorers are in many places doing notable service: against the saloon, for the Christian Sabbath, against the Sunday theatre, Sunday base ball games and all forms of lawlessness. Their missionary enthusiasm is rising, too, and it is believed that the Endeavor Societies will give this year at least $250,000 through their own denominational boards on Christian Endeavor Day.

Much is being done also in great cities for the relief of the destitute by unions and Endeavor societies. May I not ask the prayers of your readers for those increasing hosts

Martha of Lebanon.

The Syrian Housewife's Story Continued—Kitchen and Wardrobe—Children's Joys—The Family Sheep and its Uses.

WE dispose ourselves upon the cushions, my guide and instructor—Syrian by birth, American by education, pure womanly by nature, and earnest Christian by grace—with the ease acquired by years of practice, I more comfortably than before I began the round of visits that has engrossed me of late. The cushions are round, long, stuffed with hay, and covered with Turkey red cotton. While the gentle voice that lends itself musically even to Arabic, goes on with friendly discourse with the mistress of the home, I have opportunity—given me purposely—to inventory the furniture.

I amuse myself with imaginations of how the wife of a New Jersey or Illinois day-laborer in steady employment, would behave if introduced to this place as her abiding-place for the rest of her natural life. On two sides of the room runs a wide shelf of unplanned boards, elevated upon sticks about a foot from the earth which is the floor. On this is piled the family bedding in the shape of "pallets"—two breadths of cotton cloth run together at the edges, and swaddled with hay or cotton or cloth or rags, to the thickness of an inch or so. Upon one of the quilts the would-be sleeper will lie to-night when it is unfolded over the floor, and with another he or she will be covered, the nights being chilly at this season. Father, mother and five children will rest upon these pallets, laid as closely together as they can be put, and having known no other beds, their rest will be sweet in spite of the unyielding floor, the low ceiling and the stuffiness arising from seven pairs of lungs and seven unwashed bodies. Windows and doors will be closed, for the night-air is believed to be unwholesome. Martha would also ask in grave wonderment when she hears of the daily baths of her pale-faced visitors, if they "are not afraid of making themselves ill by so much washing?" She is neat and notable according to her lights, but illumination has never struck athwart the, to us, vital question of much soap and more water.

Before judging her, I recall the reply made to me once, by a New York woman who has thrown talents, energy—all that make up and abound in her grand personality—into the work of elevating working-women to a higher plane of thought and living.

"They might at least, make themselves 'skin-clean,'" I heard said, "even if they have not time for keeping their poor rooms tidy. Bathing costs little."

"You might change your mind if you had to perform your ablutions in a quart of water, brought by hand—and a very tired hand! up four flights of rickety stairs," retorted the practical philanthropist.

Every drop of the water used in Martha's household is brought from the fountain in the village at the foot of the hill, and brought upon her shoulder in a huge jar of baked clay. The recreation she derives from gossip, friendly or mischievous, with other burden-bearers who there do congregate, hardly offsets the bodily fatigue of trudging up the steep and stony path. Her husband stays his labor in the threshing-floor and leaning upon the "fan" in his hand, throws her a kindly word as she passes, the drip from the water-pot mingling with the sweat of her face. He is a model spouse as Moslem spouses go, but he would no sooner think of offering to run up the hill with her load, than Eleazar of Damascus thought of forestalling Rebekah in her hospitable task of "watering all his camels," after she had let down her pitcher from her shoulder and given him to drink.

As for her boys, she spoils them from the beginning, teaching them by object-lessons, if not by precept, the inferiority of her sex to theirs. Sooner than degrade them to the position of drawers of water, she would fetch and carry every hour of every day of all the days of her life. In due course of time they will marry and each bring his child-wife home for at least one year to be drilled in housework by her mother-in-law. Martha will get her "innings" then, and lives consciously in hope of this consummation.

To-morrow morning, she will hustle the laggards out of bed and out-of-doors that she may roll up the beds and pack them upon the shelf. The cushions keep them company except when a visitor drops in, and besides these, there is absolutely no furniture in the house,—neither table nor chair, not a stool, or anything bearing the faintest resemblance to a chest of drawers. The family wardrobe is upon their backs. If there are extra garments they are in sundry uncouth bundles and a couple of rough boxes tucked under a broad shelf and among the bedding. Her pots and kettles, jars and bowls compose the "plenishing" of the home.

"But when it rains," I ask, "where is the cooking done then?"

Martha brings out a misshapen utensil of clay baked in the coals, which is enough like the braziers in use by tinkers and solderers to make it recognizable as a receptacle for fire. She explains how this is set upon the pillar in the middle of the floor, a fire built within it, and what could be more satisfactory?

"HER TURF-ROOFED HUT."

"Where does the smoke go?"

A gesture replies—"Anywhere!"

"And the children, who cannot run out of doors in the rain?"

She admits that they are troublesome in such circumstances, but it is the will of God that the rain falls, and she must make the best of it.

I think of the five restless little beings, wild as hawks and wayward as the wind, and the curling smoke under the low rafters, and the dampened roof making dark the interior, and find the only light in the picture in the reflection that real winter and Syrian rains—violent deluges as I know them to be—last, as a rule, but two months a year.

She will have few of the morning tasks to perform that render the day-dawning a bugbear to occidental housewives. When the mats are stowed away, a cup of coffee made for her husband and the children served with a cake of tough bread apiece to be devoured when and where they please, the day may be said to be fairly upon its feet. Her husband has carried his luncheon to the field with him; the children will be nibbling all day long, but there will be no noon-day meal spread or cooked. It is surprising, by the way, what an amount of various trash those childish stomachs tried to dispose of during the day. Besides the leathery cakes that are the chief of their diet, there are radishes in abundance—big, juicy roots—to be had for the pulling out of the ground, and raw turnips, and onions, and salads, and such homely sweets as the mother compounds. They run about with slices of cold, boiled beets in grimy fingers, devouring them as greedily as if they were candy, and chew and suck bits of purple sugar-cane, and there is a tall jar of "dips," i.e., grape-juice, boiled down to the consistency of treacle—in the corner of the house, to which resort is made when the mother's back is turned.

Candidly, we cannot see what Martha can find to keep her as busy all day long as she assures us she is. That she believes herself overworked is evinced by the worried plaits between her eyes, as deep as the furrows ploughed by ceaseless toil and care in the forehead of a New England farmeress. Yet this is the easy season among the dwellers upon Lebanon slopes, for the silk-worm work is over for the year, and the eggs that are to be hatched next spring are simply done up in bags and hung up in the church over yonder,—less out of custom or superstition than because the eggs must be kept at an even temperature, and out of the children's way. For these ends there is no safer place than the church. All the neighbors thus utilize the sacred place, and the priest raises no objection. Martha does not know how she could pay the rent of her house and keep the children clothed, but for the blessed worms. From the beginning of the season, when the eggs are disposed upon boards and hurdles in the hut, to the day when the last cocoon is completed, the family dwell in booths out-of-doors, leaving the quiet dwelling to the voracious feeders upon the mulberry leaves gathered fresh daily for them. They eat the whole of the first crop; a second puts forth for the sheep.

This last word is in the singular number in more than one sense of the adjective, as our illustration will show. The oldest girl of the humble home has her hands full for some hours of each day in collecting food and literally stuffing it down the throat of the animal. It is tied, and could not get away if it would. It soon ceases to frisk and tug at the cord, and is as quiescent under treatment as the Strasbourg goose whose feet are fast to a board, and whose liver distends abnormally in the attempt to digest the matter with which it is surfeited. The sheep belongs to a breed that has very broad tails. As he becomes first plump, then fat, then so unwieldy that he can hardly breathe, and does not offer to move, the tail grows to an enormous size, often weighing from thirty to forty pounds. To the day of his death which must be a relief to the ponderous body, the stuffing is kept up, and he must have consumed many times his weight in mulberry leaves. The horrified beholder marvels within his disgusted soul if the creature could not be spun into silk as well as the worms which are monsters of gluttony and corpulence.

Of the skin with the fleece on, Martha has made, about every fifth year, a coat for her husband who sometimes has work further up the mountain in winter. If this be not worn out, she finds a ready market for wool and hide. Every morsel of the precious fat is treasured, "fried out," and clarified, then poured into jars to harden, and used during the winter as butter. Few cows are kept by the peasants in the country, none in towns. When milk must be had, they get it from goats, or buy from better-off neighbors. All classes are fond of what is called "lebben," which is nothing more or less than lopped milk, "turned" into firm blanc-mange-like consistency by adding to sour milk a "lebben" left over from the previous day. This makes the delicacy more sharply acid than our lopped milk, or "bonny clobber," as the Southerners name it. I have seen "lebben" passed with a dish of rice and meat at a hotel-table, and eaten from the same plate as we would a vegetable or sauce.

The bones and meat of the valuable sheep are boiled until the flesh slips off easily, when it is cut into small pieces, seasoned well and packed into jars. Melted suet is "flowed" over the surface, and the jars are set in a cool, dry place. Except when a chicken is killed upon some great holiday, the family have no other meat than this as long as it lasts.

Martha reckons fat of whatever kind as more valuable than lean meat, and next to olive oil, the stored suet from her fatted sheep as most desirable. It is, really, sweeter and more delicate than could be imagined of "mutton-tallow," and should not be confounded with it.

I have rated the thirty-two cents a day which represent the earnings of the head of this Syrian house as equal to a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half in United States currency. I am told by trustworthy authorities that this is a fair statement in view of the wide disparity between the customs of the two countries, as well as between the needs of the poorer classes here and in America. Martha does not need to lay in coal or wood, or to keep up fires night and day. Charcoal is cheap; sticks may be had for the gathering, and in the lower countries, dried camels' manure is sold at a trifling cost in the markets for fuel. The boys need no flannels, no shoes, no bonnets or caps, no Sunday clothes, no bedsteads, bureaux, washstands, chairs or even tables.

Tea is an unknown luxury, and when she uses coffee, it is of the commonest sort. There is no striving to keep up appearances. So long as she lives as well as her foremothers and her acquaintances, and a little better than the majority of the last-named, she is content. Her world, to our eyes, may be typified by the compass of her turf-roofed hut, but it is all the world she knows, or is likely to know.

MARION HARLAND.

"CAN be patient with her," was Marie Paull's answer to her uncle, "but not with anyone who insinuates that my father is guilty of anything that could injure his reputation if the whole truth were known," she answered, with the haughtiness of an offended princess. "Of course, I shall tell the children, as you advise, that their dear papa will not be home for a long time—just that, and nothing more. And you may depend upon me never to introduce his name in conversation with mamma. Further than this I promise nothing."

Angry, compassionate, yet somewhat amused by what he considered her "ridiculous high-tragedy airs," the uncle next sought an interview with his eldest nephew, who bore the family name and his mother's face. Him he took into fuller confidence. Lanier was over seventeen, a lad of singular sense and discretion, and a Freshman in Yale College. His uncle admitted to him, by tactful degrees, that his father had misapplied trust-funds, intending, no doubt, to put them back into the hands of their lawful owners, when he had made his profit out of them. The failure of a speculation that had promised well, would compel him to remain out of the country until the matter could be adjusted, or should be forgotten.

The young face flushed darkly, the features were set hard in pain and mortification: "Can there be no mistake, Uncle Roger? Have you looked into the affair for yourself?" "My boy! could I rest a day without going to the bottom of it? All that I have told you is unfortunately, fatally true. Your mother, I need not remind so good a son as yourself, Lanier, is the person most seriously affected by your father's error. You are now her mainstay. Care for her as a loving, sorrowing wife should be cared for. It is a sacred charge."

The most shameful part of the story was kept back from all of Ernest Paull's children. It was not a tale for young ears.

Lanier wrote daily to his mother, when she was well enough to read his letters, fondly, and with tenderest solicitude, striving to cheer her without betraying his knowledge of the extent of her grief and need. The brightest hour in the twenty-four for her was that in which she received and read his love-letters, yet Mrs. Williams had marvelled within herself that the effect produced by them was transitory.

Mrs. Paull held out her hand to the baby-est of the quartette, as they tiptoed up to the bed.

"Lift her up, please, Marie!" she said, motioning to the place enclosed by her arm.

When the rosy cheek touched hers upon the pillow, she asked,—

"What has my little Gladys been doing this afternoon?"

Marie's attempt to catch the child's eye, unseen by the mother or Gladys, did not escape Mrs. Williams.

"Marie has been dressing my doll, and talking to us of dear papa," chirped the baby. "I wish he would come home!" heaving a sigh. "We cried two times this evening—Marie and me, both—for him."

"We didn't!" protested the boys, stoutly, nine-year-old Tom adding—"All the same, we want to see him awfully!"

Mrs. Paull pressed her hand over her eyes: the lower part of her face was so ghastly that the nurse came to the front.

"Now, my chickens, your supper is all ready for you downstairs. When I was in the kitchen awhile ago, I was sure that I smelled cookies. Or it may have been gingerbread. Your mother hopes to sit up in her easy-chair a little while to-morrow, if we don't tire her too much to-night. I shouldn't be a mite surprised if she should be strong enough to hold Gladys in her lap in a week. People get well fast after they begin to sit up."

She swung Gladys from the bed, and tossed her up at the full length of her robust arms, kissed her cheek as she set her upon the floor, and opening the door, bustled the laughing party into the hall.

"If you eat a good supper and don't get your faces and hands sticky, you can peep in at mamma again to say 'Good-night,'" she sent down the stairs after them.

Marie darted a ray of indignant contempt at her; drew up her slight figure, and from her stand at the foot of the bed, surveyed her mother silently, evidently waiting for her to uncover her eyes.

"If I believed in shaking people I should be disposed to try it on her!" was the nurse's first thought, superseded by a kinder second, after a glance at the pale misery of the girl's face. Something must be done before Mrs. Paull met the meaning gaze. She began in desperate cheerfulness:

"You have no idea, Miss Marie, what a difference your coming home makes to us all. I believe those children begin to count the days from the time you leave us on Monday morning, until you are to be with us again, and I had to laugh to-day, to hear Elspeth singing, 'There's nae luck about th' house,' while she was making up your bed."

"She didn't sing the next line, I suppose—being under orders?" struck in Marie, unexpectedly, a sardonic gleam playing over her face. "Can I speak to you in the other room, Mrs. Williams?"

Mr. Paull's portrait was there still, set carefully upon the table, but in a corner out of the reach of possible harm. Marie closed the inner door behind them, and confronted the nurse, head up and nostrils quivering.

"I am forbidden, by my uncle, Mr. Lanier, to speak to my mother upon the subject that lies nearest my heart," she said, frigidly. "It is evident that you, also, are acting under orders. Perhaps you may be authorized to transact business in his absence? It is a singular state of things when a daughter, who has been honored all her life long with the confidence of both parents, must use a comparative stranger as a medium of communication with her mother."

She became more stilted in speech as she went on, bent as she was in her girlish arrogance, upon crushing the presumptuous intruder. She completed the absurdity by a wave of the hand, which, had Mrs. Williams ever known Ernest Paull, would have brought him to her mind.

"But let that pass! My object in asking for a few minutes of your valuable time—for which I suppose my uncle remunerates you—is to inquire if I may take that picture up to my own room. It is but so much rubbish on this floor. Have you the liberty to tell me if my mother has expressed any desire to have it back in the old place—the place my father meant it to hold when he gave it to her?"

"Not yet, Miss Marie. She is, as you can see, extremely weak and nervous—not at all herself, in fact—"

Another wave of the hand, intended to be majestic, but merely impatient.

"I do not care to enter upon the subject of my mother's nerves—or notions. Mrs. Williams, Dr. Bacon and Mr. Lanier are the committee upon them. I have, however, I am proud to say, some claim upon my father. Will you discover at your earliest convenience if I may be allowed the slight consolation in his absence, of having his portrait? At least until his wife's nervous system recovers tone and she can bear the sight of it."

Mrs. Williams was the picture of unruffled benevolence, unconscious of her figurative annihilation at the hands of Ernest Paull's champion.

"There can be no earthly objection to your having the picture whenever you like, I am sure, my dear, and hanging it wherever you think best. Next to your mother's, yours is the best right. I will carry it up for you while you are at supper."

"I want no supper! And I will take it up myself and now, before the permission is withdrawn."

It was a bulky burden for the slender arms, but with her unfailing tact, Mrs. Williams restrained the impulse to offer assistance beyond holding the door open for her to pass out with the coveted treasure. The habit of close, silent observation showed her that the girl's heart swelled and that she bit her lips in mounting the stairs.

"She is game to the backbone, but she is nothing but a child," she reflected, her throat swelling in sympathy. "He is her idol. There's depths of mercy even for the unthankful and the evil, and that man may yet see the error of his ways."

Mrs. Paull asked no questions when her custodian returned. If she was cognizant of the interview, and gave it a thought, she imagined that Marie had wished to consult Mrs. Williams upon some matter of household economy. She had fallen back into her old attitude; her hands clasped below her chin, her eyes resting upon the ceiling. The nurse resumed her chair and her knitting, and neither spoke until the children looked in for their "Good night" kiss.

Elspeth was directly behind them. She brought up half a broiled quail, a bunch of purple hot-house grapes, and a cluster of La France roses, all of which she set out in order upon a bedside stand.

"Mr. Lanier sent the bonny bird; Mrs. Lanier sent the grapes; the roses are from a leddy who says she was at school with ye lang syne."

The card she presented with the flowers was engraved with the name of "Mrs. William C. Barnes, 106 Wyandotte Avenue." Upon the other side was pencilled: "Have you forgotten Annie Meredith? She sends these with dear love and prayers for your speedy recovery."

"Annie Meredith!" repeated the sick woman wonderingly. "Am I in her part of Brooklyn?"

"Why, that's our minister's wife! And I was talking about her to you only this evening!" cried Mrs. Williams. "Here is something to give you an appetite! I always insist there's no sauce like an agreeable piece of news. I met Dr. Barnes right by your door last night when I ran around to the druggist's, and stopped to tell him that I was nursing you, and that you were getting on comfortably, with never an idea that you knew his wife. I s'pose she put it all together when he got home and spoke of seeing me. Ah! but she is one of the blessed among women, I can tell you!"

"You're another, Elspeth, for cooking this quail to perfection. No!" seeing Mrs. Paull about to speak—"I can't answer a single question about your old friend—though there's lots and lots to tell—until you've done justice to your supper and to Elspeth."

The Scotchwoman's dry smile was somewhat forced. One of her nurslings was missing, and as soon as she could get them out of the room, she marshalled the boys, and, with Gladys in her arms, mounted to the upper story.

The front chamber immediately over Mrs. Paull's was Marie's. The hall-bedroom adjoining was shared by Tom and Edwin; Elspeth had slept in the nursery with Gladys' crib beside her bed since Mrs. Paull fell ill. She undressed the child and put her to bed before looking up the absent and fasting member of her flock. Marie's door was locked on the inside, and half-a-dozen guarded knocks upon the panels were unanswered. Elspeth stooped to put her lips to the key-hole.

"Me bairnie! winna ye open to yer auld nurse?"

Still there was an irresolute pause before the key was turned, and Marie appeared, her eyes swollen and cheeks discolored with crying.

"Cannot even you leave me alone, Elspeth? I would not have let anybody else in."

"That's partly why I am." "Ye'll be ill if ye tak' neither bit nor sup the night."

"I want nothing! I could not eat a mouthful!"

The stiff pose and defiant tone gave way before the sweep of childish emotion. She threw herself sobbing into the Scotchwoman's arms.

"Elspeth! my heart is breaking for my father! Where is he? What terrible thing has driven him from home and lost him everybody's love but mine? Why am I to ask no questions, and why does my mother shudder at the sound of his name as if he were something evil and hateful? He has been gone over three weeks, and not a word has come from him. Is he dead—and Uncle Roger will not let me know?"

"Save and bless the child! what could put that into your bit head? No, my puir bairnie! no! never that I've been told. Mr. Lanier, he but said to me that Mr. Paull had gone over the sea to furren pairts, on business, and it was likely be quite a while before we'd hear from him. But there's nae sic thing as ye spoke of, my bonnie lassie. Not nearly so close to it as she that lies down-stairs, that's been to the very gate of the dark valley, and is still as like to gae through the one door as th'ither, if the truth were known. It's for your mother I'm on the knees of me heart for, all the day long. Yer father's a man—and healthy and strong, for all ony of us ken to the contrary, and able to fend for himself."

Marie raised her head from the broad shoulder, and pushed herself away from the would-be comforter.

"You are like all the rest of them! He is an angel on earth or in heaven! And there is not one of all those whom he has befriended, or whom he loves, who cares whether he be alive or dead, but only myself. But I'll never forsake him—never! never! Do you see that?"

She pointed to the portrait hung over against the bed, as it had hung by her mother's. Upon a stand below it she had arranged her Bible and several devotional books, and directly under the pictured face was a vase of clouded glass—a "tear vase," as it is called—with a spray of heliotrope.

"It was his favorite flower. Do you recollect how he would come to me every morning for a sprig from my heliotrope bush, and how he always kissed me after I had pinned it upon his coat? I'll say my prayers right there, night and morning when I'm at home—if the house where he is forgotten and his very name blotted out can be called 'home.' Wherever I go, he is my patron saint."

"Humph!" Had her life depended upon her silence, Elspeth could hardly have repressed the homely sniff. "I'm thinking ye'll mak' but a puir Papist if fasting for a matter of sax hours has made ye daft. It's to be hoped the mother will surely get well. The children wad fare ill if they'd nought but a feather-headed bit like ye to look to for clothes and common sense. I've nae time to waste chattering an' hawvering here about heliotropes and patron saints, when there's a living Christian in need of nursing. Ye'll either come down to yer tea like a sane body, or I'll send it to ye by the hand of Mrs. Williams, and myself step around to Dr. Bacon for ye. I doot but he'll clap a blister on the back o' yer heid. Ye're not a' right, there, or somewheers else!"

She looked, and as Marie knew was, altogether capable of carrying out the threat. Dumb with useless wrath, the dejected girl chose the lesser evil of sitting down to the cream-toast and broiled ham prepared for her by the tyrant who waited upon her, as if nothing had occurred to mar their friendly relations.

Sentimentality, which may be defined as fatty degeneration of naturally healthy sympathies, met with no toleration from Elspeth. Just now, she was too much engrossed by actual and pressing anxieties to waste thought upon imaginary or over-wrought grief.

Her tone had a more hopeful ring, but care still sat visibly upon her brow when she met Mr. Lanier at his visit on Saturday forenoon.

"She's sitting up the day, sir," in response to his queries. "She will have it that she is better, and her heart is set upon having a talk with yourself." She tell't me awhile ago that there was important business must be looked after, and she had put it off overlong ready. I'm viftul to be putting a word into yer ear, sir, upon another matter before you see her. Saving your presence, Miss Marie will come to grief unless her mind is made easier the one way or the other."

In fewer words than any other of five hundred women would have used, she narrated the incident of the portrait.

Roger Lanier's clear-cut features were marble as he listened. He had never liked Ernest Paull, when the latter was at his best. At his worst, he detested him as cordially as a Christian man can detest an unrepentant sinner. Marie's impassioned loyalty was but another trail of the serpent over the stirred nest. Elspeth was not supersensitive, but she lost courage to plead the cause she had in mind when she began her story, at sight of his stony visage. Her voice shook a little in concluding with an appeal.

"If she might but write to her father—say once a month, sir—he's that, you know, sir, and unco' fond o' her—'twad mak' her the more content, and wad, mayhap, be blest to his guid—"

A Christian Philanthropist Gone.

The Late George W. Childs and His Services for Humanity and Religion.

IN the death of Mr. George W. Childs, the distinguished philanthropist, who passed away in Philadelphia last week, America loses one of its noblest public men, and the Christian church a most devoted servant and supporter. Mr. Childs was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1820, of parents in comparatively humble circumstances. He received but little schooling, but early in life developed strong traits of character which afterward broadened as manhood advanced. At ten years of age he became errand boy in a book-store; at thirteen, he entered the United States Navy as an apprentice, remaining there, however, only a year and a half.

THE LATE GEORGE W. CHILDS.

While still a very young man, he went to Philadelphia poor and almost friendless, and secured a position in a book store kept by a Quaker, whom he served so well that he was soon advanced to a position of responsibility. In a few years, he had saved several hundred dollars and at the same time had developed marked aptitude for business, being specially methodical, conscientious and observant. With this capital, he embarked in business as a bookseller, and a few years more saw him at the head of one of the oldest book-selling and publishing firms in Philadelphia. In this business his success was remarkable. After 12 years' further experience, he made up his mind to own a newspaper and his ambition was gratified when, in December, 1864, he bought the "Public Ledger." His excellent methods transformed what had been a loss into a phenomenal success, and one of the most profitable as well as most reliable and enterprising journals in the country was built up by Mr. Childs' indefatigable efforts. From that day until the day of his death, he was identified with his paper in every department.

Mr. Childs was one of the few men who, when wealth flowed in upon him as the result of his wonderful business abilities, knew how to employ it to the best advantage. For many years past, he had been in receipt of a princely income, which he employed in a public-spirited and philanthropic way, to the advancement of the best interests of the community in which he lived. He constantly sought opportunities to benefit his fellow-men, and was a benefactor to thousands, giving in secret to many whose self-respect would have been wounded by open benevolence, and helping hundreds of worthy families. Among his many charities we can only mention a few. He was the liberal patron of the newsboys, bootblacks, and valets and strays of Philadelphia; he aided financially and otherwise many projects devised by the workingmen of that city and at all times responded sympathetically and generously to appeals for help.

When a great public calamity visited any section of the country, no one gave more liberally towards the relief of the sufferers. Together with Mr. Drexel, his associate and intimate friend, who died recently, he spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in various philanthropic schemes in different sections of the country, one of the most notable being the building of the town of Wayne, a suburb of Philadelphia, with a view to the encouragement of home-owning by persons of limited means. His own employees, who were numbered by the hundred, knew him as one of the best of men, considerate and kind, and to serve him became a pleasure as well as a profitable occupation. His mail was burdened with applications for charity every day, and it is estimated that he probably gave away a thousand dollars daily in various causes, for the benefit of others.

A man of sterling Christian principles, a faithful steward of the goods entrusted to him by the Master, a public-spirited and progressive citizen, he was easily one of the foremost representative Americans of his time, and he will be greatly missed by those who have been the recipients of his generosity. A portrait of Mr. Childs is given on this page.

After the Grip

In Misery—No Appetite or Strength

Hood's Sarsaparilla Cures Appetite and Full Strength.

"After I had the grip in the winter I felt so miserable and was in such poor health that I was nearly discouraged, had no appetite for anything, and everything I ate I had to force down. My back was so lame it was almost impossible to lift a kettle from the stove. I bought a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and before I had taken all of it

I Felt Ever So Much Better.

It gave me a good appetite and I could eat a hearty meal and enjoy it, and the lameness in my Sarsaparilla Cures back has all gone. Hood's Sarsaparilla seemed to tone my stomach and make it feel better than anything else I have ever taken. I am now well." Mrs. MARY ZIMMERMAN, Verona, N. Y.

The Duty of Charity.

IN a remarkably interesting article on "The Personal Problem of Charity," published in the "Forum," Rev. Lyman Abbott, pastor of Plymouth Church, says:

"The Church of Christ has a great opportunity before it. Will it see and lay hold upon that opportunity? We have been asking ourselves, Why do not the poor come to church? Now the question is reversed: 'Will the Church go to the poor?' I do not mean in contributions to 'organized charities,' but in personal visitation. In Christ's picture of the judgment he does not say to the righteous, 'I was an hungered, thirsty, a stranger, naked, sick, and in prison, and ye sent a secretary unto me,' but 'ye fed and clothed and visited me.' Now is the judgment-day of the Church of Christ. And it is not enough for the Church to take care of its own poor. Some unhappy churches have no poor. Every city church ought to fix the geographical limits of a parish, for which it should assume responsibility, and, either alone, or in conjunction with some other church or churches, should undertake to visit the entire district, and ascertain where there is distress to be relieved. In this visiting the object should not be to do detective work,—that is, to discover fraud; nor to do inquisitorial work,—that is, to pry into the history of the family, rake over its past, learn its history, and sit in judgment on its faults. Neither, on the other hand, should its object be the mere distribution of clothes, food, fuel, and money to any one who asks for it, on the principle of giving the most to those who claim the most. It should be sympathetic, kindly, helpful, cautious. It should have experienced supervision, and supplies should be given out with caution. It is better to sell than to give, and to give a little rather than much, and never to give at all except with personal inquiry or personal knowledge, and as the expression of personal sympathy. But if cautious and experienced visitors cannot be secured, I would encourage incautious and inexperienced ones to undertake the work. Inexperienced love is better than none at all. Between sympathy without wisdom and wisdom without sympathy is a hard choice, and we ought not to be driven to it. But if the choice must be made the unwise sympathy is better than the unsympathetic wisdom; wisdom will be acquired in the work, while the suspicious and unsympathetic heart will grow more suspicious and more unsympathetic.

"The various organized efforts for the relief of distress in the great cities of the United States are among the consummate fruits of Christianity. There are many of us who can in the nature of the case do very little personal work among the poor, who must do most of their work through the agency of others. I am myself one of that number. But even the busiest of us can do a little. What little we do can be done in a spirit of really friendly sympathy, not grudgingly, reluctantly, and from a sense of duty. Even when we work through others, we can know whom we are helping and what we are doing. The nearer we can get to those we befriend, the better for them and for us. And in our churches we can drop for a little while sitting in judgment on those of our fellow-Christians who doubt whether Moses wrote the Pentateuch, or who hope that there is sunshine in another world for those who have spent all their lives in darkness in this, and unite with them to carry food to the hungry and fuel to the cold, without confounding the needy with the vicious, or unteaching the lessons of sobriety and thrift to one class while we, who pride ourselves on our thrift, are learning the more important lesson of Christian love."

AFRAID OF DELAY.

Mr. Quinn, the well-known Anti-Gambling Evangelist, tells a rather remarkable story of his experience with a man during recent revival services in Buffalo. One of the audience came to him after the meeting and talked to him about conversion. The man evidently did not believe in conversion. Mr. Quinn earnestly spoke to him about the matter, and urged him to accept Christ once, but the man "begged off."

"Now," said Mr. Quinn, "suppose we let the matter in this light: Suppose you take up your mind to accept Christ when you are sixty years of age. You are now about twenty-five."

"Ah," said the man reflectively, "that won't do. That is too old. I might probably not live until then."

"Well, then, forty years of age," said Mr. Quinn, "How will that do?"

"No," said the man, hesitatingly, "My brothers died before they reached that age."

"Well, thirty years of age," said Mr. Quinn.

"No," said the man. "My mother died before she was thirty," and tears moistened his eyes as he spoke.

"My friend," said Mr. Quinn, "suppose when you put it off until you are twenty-six, that's a year from now."

"Well," said the man, still hesitating, "I think I might do it sooner than that."

"My friend," said Mr. Quinn, solemnly, "the best thing you can do is to accept Christ to-night."

The man knelt down and gave his heart to Christ before leaving the hall.

A LITTLE DAUGHTER'S REJOINDER.

The daughter of a Western superintendent, a little lady of fourteen years, who runs a typewriter for her busy papa, was recently working off the weekly church news for a religious paper at her father's dictation. She reached a paragraph stating that in a certain church the ladies had organized a missionary society. "Woman's missionary society in capitals, papa?" she asked. "No," was the response, "they are quite common now." "I'll tell you, papa," exclaimed the young assistant, "when they organize a man's missionary society, we will put that in capitals, won't we?"

A Novelty

To some people who are not at present familiar with its value, but our friends have been using it for 30 years and regard the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk as a household necessity, and indispensable to good cooking.

"SANITAS."

Unfermented, CONCENTRATED and Pure JUICE OF THE GRAPE.

FOR THE COMMUNION TABLE.

The unfermented juice of red grapes, known as the Zinfandel variety, is offered to churches generally as a fitting "wine" for the communion table. It will be found in every respect purely a product of the grape, and answers exactly to our Saviour's expression: "Fruit of the vine." This product is the result of an entirely new process, involves no boiling, and preserves the freshness of the grape juice almost as one tastes it in eating ripe grapes.

Two varieties of our concentrated juice suitable for redilution with any aerated, carbonated or pure cold water are bottled under our labels—i. e., Red, Zinfandel, White, Muscatel.

Sold only in pint bottles, the contents of which are equal to ONE-HALF GALLON OF FRESH GRAPE JUICE. Price, 65 cents per bottle. For sale by leading druggists and grocers. Send for descriptive circular.

THE CONSUMER'S SUPPORT.

The grape cure has been found in many cases to rapidly reorganize and reconstruct the blood current, and to surprise the tissues and excite the nervous system into health. The beverage form of grape juice is an agreeable and wholesome nutrient in a great variety of sicknesses. Its fruit acids, its blood salts and its grape sugar make it a valuable medicine. It affords a nourishing and easily managed food for dyspeptics of many kinds. We seek to supplant alcoholic and fermented drinks by something more wholesome, more satisfying and refreshing—something embodying all the best principles of ripe grapes marred by nothing that would falsely stimulate or excite; and in the new era that is dawning, the life-giving principles of the grape, in their purest condition, will enter every home as a comfort and a blessing, instead of a delusion and a snare.

Its sub-acid taste and easiness of assimilation give it a high value in fevers of every sort. Its concentration, keeping qualities and palatability give it certain advantages over the beverage form. It is agreeably administered in aerated water or hot or cold water.

ELI BROWN.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

The Christian Herald Readers Grandly Extending their Work of Relieving the Destitute Through the "Food Fund"—Thirteen Relief Stations Now Open.

AT the opening of the fifth week of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOOD FUND, and with the full tide of benevolence still flowing in from every State, it is fitting that we should ask our friends everywhere—and especially those who have, by their generosity, developed the work to its present proportions—to glance over the field in which their gifts are now being distributed. Those contributions have come from men and women of all ages and conditions in life; but all alike imbued with the consecrated Christian spirit of helpfulness and zeal in behalf of those who suffer. In many instances the gifts have been the result of no little sacrifice; but the letters accompanying them bear internal evidence of the firm and abiding faith of the senders in the Divine promise of blessing that follows true giving: "Thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works and in all that thou puttest thy hand unto." (Deut. 10: 12.)

The Police census of the unemployed in New York, which has just been completed, confirms in every way the statements made in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. 67,380 men and women are out with the true spirit of Christian charity, have given so liberally of their own substance to feed the "Lord's poor" in this emergency.

During the week, the Food Fund has still further extended its operations by the opening of four new Relief Stations and the employment of sixteen more city missionaries as District Visitors, making twenty-three in all now at work. The complete list of stations now stands as follows:

Total families fed daily..... 1,500

Or, averaging each family at five persons, an aggregate of 9,000 destitute fed daily in their own homes, through the bounty of the contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund! To these have to be added 2,400 homeless men, who are fed every morning and 500 women and children every afternoon, at the headquarters at No. 210 Eighth Avenue, and twenty inmates of the Destitute Working-men's Home, established last week at No. 88 Roosevelt St., by Mr. S. S. Hadley, superintendent of the Water Street Rescue Mission, thus making a grand total of 12,020 who are now supplied with food through the Fund.

In a spiritual sense, the work of the Fund has kept pace with the material aid it has been the means of rendering to the destitute. It is a part of the duty of the Fund's missionaries who visit the tenements to ascertain the denominational preferences of the families receiving relief and to obtain their consent, if possible, to a visit by the nearest pastor of their denomination. As the Fund is co-operating with the city pastors of all the Protestant denominations, this is readily arranged. The consent of the parents is also asked to have their children attend Sunday School and the superintendent of the nearest Sunday School is communicated with and induced to take an active interest in them. A wonderful transformation has already been noted in many families, whose gratitude has found expression in renewed trust in the Divine Helper and in the leading of better lives. In thousands of such humble homes in New York to-day, amid the aspirations that ascend to the Throne in thankful acknowledgment of the relief afforded, the generous contributors to the Food Fund are not forgotten. "The dear Lord will surely bless and prosper the kind people who sent food to my babies," said a mother at one of the East Side stations of the Fund. "My husband and I wouldn't a-minded, but we couldn't bear to see them suffer."

Some of the cases met with are pitiable almost beyond description. In one wretched home, four children were found, their only guardian being a blind father, who, of course, could do nothing to

LIGHTNING OF THE SEA.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Text: Job 41: 32, "He maketh a path to shine after him."

IF for the next thousand years ministers of religion should preach from this Bible there will yet be texts unexpounded, and unexplained, and unappreciated. What little has been said concerning this chapter in Job from which my text is taken, bears on the controversy as to what was really the leviathan described as disturbing the sea. What creature it was I know not. Some say it was a whale. Some say it was a crocodile. My own opinion is it was a sea-monster now extinct. No creature now floating in Mediterranean or Atlantic waters corresponds to Job's description.

What most interests me is that as it moved on through the deep it left the waters flashing and resplendent. In the words of the text: "He maketh a path to shine after him." What was that illumined path? It was phosphorescence. You find it in the wake of a ship in the night, especially after rough weather. Phosphorescence is the lightning of the sea. That this figure of speech is correct in describing its appearance I am certified by an incident. After crossing the Atlantic the first time and writing from Basle, Switzerland to an American an account of my voyage, in which nothing more fascinated me than the phosphorescence in the ship's wake, I called it The Lightning of the Sea. Returning to my hotel I found a book of John Ruskin, and the first sentence my eyes fell upon was his description of phosphorescence, in which he called it "The Lightning of the Sea." Down to the post office I hastened to get the manuscript, and with great labor and some expense got possession of the magazine article and put quotation marks around that one sentence, although it was as original with me as with John Ruskin. I suppose that nine-tenths of you living so near the sea-coast have watched this marine appearance called phosphorescence, and I hope that the other one-tenth may some day be so happy as to witness it. It is the waves of the sea diamonded; it is the inflorescence of the billows; the waves of the sea crimsoned, as was the deep after the sea-fight of Lepanto; the waves of the sea on fire. There are times when from horizon to horizon the entire ocean seems in conflagration with this strange splendor, as it changes every moment to tamer or more dazzling color on all sides of you. You sit looking over the taffrail of the yacht or ocean steamer watching and waiting to see what new thing the God of beauty will do with the Atlantic. It is the ocean in transfiguration; it is the marine world casting its garments of glory in the pathway of the Almighty as he walks the deep; it is an inverted firmament with all its stars gone down with it. No picture can present it, for photographer's camera cannot be successfully trained to catch it, and before it the hand of the painter drops its pencil overawed and powerless. This phosphorescence is the appearance of myriads of the animal kingdom rising, falling, playing, flashing, living, dying. These luminous animalcules for nearly one hundred and fifty years have been the study of naturalists and the fascination and solemnization of all who have brain enough to think. Now, God, who puts in his Bible nothing trivial or useless, calls the attention of Job, the greatest scientist of his day, to this phosphorescence, and as the leviathan of the deep sweeps past, points out the fact that "he maketh a path to shine after him."

Is that true of us now, and will it be true of us when we have gone? Will there be subsequent light or darkness? Will there be a trail of gloom or good cheer? Can any one between now and the next 100 years say of us truthfully as the text says of the leviathan of the deep, "He maketh a path to shine after him?" For we are moving on. While we live in the same house, and transact business in the same store, and write on the same table, and chisel in the same studio, and thresh in the same barn, and worship in the same church, we are in motion, and are in many respects moving on, and we are not where we were ten years ago, nor where we will be ten years hence. Moving on! Look at the family record, or the almanac, or into the mirror, and see if any one of you is where you were. All in motion. Other feet may trip, and stumble, and halt, but the feet of not one moment for the last sixty centuries has tripped, or stumbled, or halted. Moving on! Society moving on! The world moving on! Heaven moving on! The universe moving on! Time moving on! Eternity moving on! Therefore, it is absurd to think that we ourselves can stop, as we must move with all the rest. Are we like the creature of the text, making our path to shine after us? It may be a peculiar question, but my text suggests it. What influence will we leave in this world after we have gone through it? "None," answer hundreds of voices, "we are not one of the immortals. Fifty years after we are out of the world it will be as though we never inhabited it." You are wrong in saying that. I pass down through this audience and up through these galleries, and I am looking for some one whom I cannot find. I am looking for one who will have no influence in this world 100 years from now. But I have found the man who has the least influence, and I inquire into his history and I find that by a yes or a no he decided some one's eternity. In time of temptation he gave an affirmative or a negative to some temptation which another, hearing of, was induced to decide in the same way. Clear on the other side of the next million years may be the first you hear of the long-reaching influence of that yes or no, but hear of it you will. Will that father make a path to shine after him? Will that mother make a path to shine after her? You will be walking along these streets, or along that country road, 200 years from now in the character of your descendants. They will be affected by your courage or your cowardice, your purity or your depravity, your holiness or your sin. You will make the path to shine after you or blacken after you. Why should they point out to us on some mountain two rivulets, one of which passes down into the rivers which pour out into the Pacific Ocean and the other rivulet flowing down into the rivers which pass out into the Atlantic Ocean? Every man, every woman, stands at a point where words uttered, or deeds done, or prayers offered, decide opposite destinies and opposite eternities. We see a man planting a tree, and treading the sod firmly on either side of it, and watering it in dry weather, and taking a great care in its culture, and he never plucks any fruit from its bough; but his children will. We are all planting trees that will yield fruit hundreds of years after we are dead: orchards of golden fruit, or groves of deadly upas. I am so fascinated with the phosphorescence in the track of a ship that I have sometimes watched for a long while, and have seen nothing on the face of the deep but blackness. The mouth of watery chasms that looked like gaping jaws of hell. Not a spark as big as the firefly; not a white scroll of surf; not a taper to illuminate the mighty sepulchres of dead ships; darkness three thousand feet deep, and more thousands of feet long and wide. That is the kind of wake that a bad man leaves behind him as he plows through the ocean of this life toward the vaster ocean of the great future.

Now, suppose a man seated in a corner grocery, or business office among clerks, gives himself to jolly scepticism. He laughs at the Bible, makes sport of the miracles, speaks of perdition in jokes, and laughs at revivals as a frolic, and at the passage of a funeral procession, which always solemnizes sensible people, says, "Boys, let's take a drink." There is in that group a young man who is making a great struggle against temptation, and prays night and morning, and reads his Bible, and is asking God for help day by day. But that guffaw against Christianity makes him lose his grip of sacred things and he gives up Sabbath, and Church, and morals, and goes from bad to worse, till he falls under dissipation, dies in a lazar house and is buried in the potter's field. Another young man who heard that jolly scepticism made up his mind that "it makes no difference what we do or say, for we will all come out at last at the right place," began, as a consequence, to purloin. Some money that came into his hands for others he applied to his own uses, thinking perhaps he would make it straight some other time, and all would be well even if he did not make it straight. He ends in the penitentiary. That scoffer who uttered the jokes against Christianity never realized what bad work he was doing, and he passed on through life, and out of it, and into a future that I am not now going to depict. I do not propose with a searchlight to show the breakers of the awful coast on which that ship is wrecked, for my business now is to watch the sea after the keel has plowed it. No phosphorescence in the wake of that ship, but behind it two souls struggling in the wave; two young men destroyed by reckless scepticism, an unillumined ocean beneath, and on all sides of them. Blackness of darkness. You know what a gloriously good man Rev. John Newton was, the most of his life, but before his conversion he was a very wicked sailor and on board the ship "Harwich," instilled infidelity and vice in the mind of a young man, principles which destroyed him. Afterward the two met and Newton tried to undo his bad work, but in vain. The young man became worse and worse, and died a profligate, horrifying with his profanities those who stood by him in his last moments. Better look out what bad influence you start for you may not be able to stop it. It does not require very great force to ruin others. Why was it that many years ago a great flood nearly destroyed New Orleans? A crawfish had burrowed into the banks of the river until the ground was saturated, and the banks weakened until the flood burst.

But I find here a man who starts out in life with the determination that he will never see suffering but he will try to alleviate it; and never see discouragement but he will try to cheer it; and never meet with anybody but he will try to do him good. Getting his strength from God, he starts from home with high purpose of doing all the good he can possibly do in one day. Whether standing behind the counter, or talking in the business office with a pen behind his ear, or making a bargain with a fellow-trader, or out in the fields discussing with his next neighbor the wisest rotation of crops, or in the shoemaker's shop pounding the sole-leather, there is something in his face, and in his phraseology, and in his manner, that demonstrates the grace of God in his heart. He can talk on religion with out awkwardly dragging it in by the ears. He loves God, and loves the souls of all whom he meets, and is interested in their present and eternal destiny. For fifty or sixty years he lives that kind of life and then gets through with it and goes into heaven a ransomed soul. But I am not going to describe the port into which that ship has entered. I am not going to describe the Pilot who met him outside at the "light ship." I am not going to say anything about the crowds of friends who met him on the crystalline wharves up which he goes on steps of chrysoprases. For God in his words to Job calls me to look at the path of foam in the wake of that ship, and I tell you it is all a gleam with splendors of kindness done, and rolling with illumined tears that were wiped away, and a dash with congratulations, and clear out to the horizon in all directions is the sparkling flashing, billowing phosphorescence of a Christian life. "He maketh a path to shine after him."

And here I correct one of the mean notions which at some time takes possession of all of us, and that is as to the brevity of human life. When I bury some very useful man, clerical or lay, in his thirtieth or fortieth year, I say, "What a waste of energies! It was hardly worth while for him to get ready for Christian work, for he had so soon to quit it." But the fact is that I may insure any man or woman who does any good on a large or small scale for a life on earth as long as the world lasts. Sickness, trolley-car accidents, death itself can no more destroy his life than they can tear down one of the rings of Saturn. You can start one good word, one kind act, one cheerful smile, on a mission that will last until the world becomes a bonfire, and out of that blaze it will pass into the heavens never to halt as long as God lives.

There were in the seventeenth century men and women whose names you never heard of who are to-day influencing schools, colleges, churches, nations. You can no more measure the gracious results of their lifetime than you could measure the length, and breadth, and depth of the phosphorescence last night following the ship of the White Star line 1,500 miles out at sea. How the courage and consecration of others inspires us to follow, as a General in the American army, cool amid the flying bullets, inspired a trembling soldier, who said afterwards, "I was nearly scared to death, but I saw the old man's white moustache over his shoulder, and went on." Aye, we are all following somebody, either in right or wrong directions. A few days ago I stood beside the garlanded casket of a Gospel minister, and in my remarks had occasion to recall a snowy night in a farmhouse when I was a boy, and an evangelist spending a night at my father's house, who said something so tender, and beautiful, and impressive that it led me into the kingdom of God, and decided my destiny for this world and the next. You will, before twenty-four hours go by, meet some man or woman with a big pack of care and trouble, and you may say something to him or her that will endure until this world shall have been so far lost in the past that nothing but the stretch of angelic memory will be able to realize that it ever existed at all. I am not talking of remarkable men and women, but of what ordinary folks can do. I am not speaking of the phosphorescence in the wake of a "Campania," but of the phosphorescence in the track of a Newfoundland fishing-smack. God makes thunderbolts out of sparks, and out of the small words and deeds of a small life he can launch a power that will flash, and burn and thunder through the eternities. How do you like this prolongation of your earthly life by deathless influence? Many a babe that died at six months of age, by the anxiety created in the parent's heart to meet that child in realms seraphic, is living yet in the transformed heart and life of those parents, and will live on forever in the history of that family. If this be the opportunity of ordinary souls, what is the opportunity o those who have especial intellectual, or sial, or monetary equipment? Have you a arithmetic capable of estimating the influence of our good and gracious friend who aw days ago went up to rest—George W.

Gilds of Philadelphia? From a newspaper it was printed for thirty years without of word of defamation, or scurrility, or sandal, and putting chief emphasis on vne and charity and clean intelligence, he rped a fortune for himself and then distributed a vast amount of it among the poor ad struggling, putting his invalid and aged orters on pensions, until his name stands erywhere for large-heartedness and sym-phy and help and highest style of Christian gentleman. In an era which had in t chairs of its journalism a Horace Ceely, and a Henry J. Raymond, and alames Gordon Bennett, and an Erastus Bocks, and a George William Curtis, ad an Irenaeus Prime, none of them will be longer remembered than George W.
Gilds. Staying away from the unveiling of the monument he had reared at lge expense in our Greenwood in memory of Professor Proctor, the astronomer, lest I ould say something in praise of the man who had paid for the monument. By all acknowledge a representative of the highest merican journalism. If you would calculate his influence for good you must count by many sheets of his newspapers have ten published in the last quarter of a centry, and how many people have read them, ad the effect not only upon those readers, it upon all whom they shall influence for a time, while you add to all that the work of the churches he helped build, and of the stitutions of mercy he helped found. Better give up before you start the measuring of the phosphorescence in the wake of that ep of the Celestial Line. Who can t the post-mortem influence of a Savonara, a Winklerfeld, a Gutenberg, a Marlbrough, a Decatur, a Toussaint, a Bolivar, Clarkson, a Robert Raikes, a Harlan Page, who had 125 Sabbath scholars, eighty-four whom became Christians, and six of them ministers of the Gospel?

With gratitude, and penitence, and worship, I mention the grandest Life that was er lived. That ship of light was launched in the heavens nearly 1900 years ago, gelic hosts chanting, and from the cele-l wharves the ship sprang into the rought sea that ever tossed. Its billows were ade up of the wrath of men and devils, erodic and Sanhedrimic persecutions stir-ing the deep with red wrath, and all the urricanes of woe smote it, until on the cks of Golgotha that life struck with a sound of agony that appalled the earth ad the heavens. But in the wake of that e what a phosphorescence of smiles on the eek of souls pardoned, and lives reformed, ad nations redeemed. The millennium it is only one roll of that irradiated wave gladness and benediction. In the sub-est of all senses it may be said of him,
He maketh a path to shine after him."

But I cannot look upon that luminosity at follows ships without realizing how nd the Lord is of life. That fire of the epris life, myriads of creatures all a-swim, ad a-play, and a-romp in parks of marine auty laid out, and parterred, and roseated, ad blossomed by Omnipotence. What is e use of those creatures called by the natalists "crustaceans" and "copepods?"
ot more than one out of hundreds of bil-ions of which are ever seen by human eye?
od created them for the same reason at he creates flowers in places where no uman foot ever makes them tremble, and o human nostril ever inhales their redol-nce, and no human eye ever sees their arm. In the botanical world they prove at God loves flowers, as in the marine orld the phosphori prove that he loves fe, and he loves life in play, life in brillancy of gladness, life in exuberance.

And so I am led to believe that he loves ur life if we fulfil our mission as fully as e phosphori fulfil theirs. The Son of od came "that we might have life, and ave it more abundantly." But I am glad o tell you that our God is not the God sometimes described as a harsh critic at the head of the universe, or an infinite scold:

or a God that loves funerals better than weddings; or a God that prefers tears to laughter, an omnipotent Nero, a ferocious Nana Sahib; but the loveliest Being in the universe, loving flowers, and life, and play, whether of phosphori in the wake of the Majestic, or of the human race keeping a holiday.

But, mark you, that the phosphorescence has a glow that the night monopolizes, and I ask you not only what kind of influence you are going to leave in the world as you pass through it, but what light are you going to throw across the world's night of sin and sorrow? People who are sailing on smooth sea and at noon do not need much sympathy, but what are you going to do for people in the night of misfortune? Will you drop on them shadow, or will you kindle for them phosphorescence? At this moment there are more people crying than laughing; more people on the round world this moment hungry than well-fed; more households bereft than homes unbroken.
What are you going to do about it? "Well," says yonder soul, "I would like to do something toward illumining the great ocean of human wretchedness, but I cannot do much."
Can you do as much as one of the phosphori in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, creatures smaller than the point of a sharp pin? "Oh, yes," you say. Then do that.
Shine! Stand before the looking-glass and experiment to see if you cannot get that scowl off your forehead; that peevish look out of your lips. Have at least one bright ribbon in your bonnet. Embroider at least one white cord somewhere in the midnight of your apparel. Do not any longer impersonate a funeral! Shine! Do say something cheerful about society, and about the world. Put a few drops of Heaven into your disposition. Once in awhile substitute a sweet orange for a sour lemon. Remember that pessimism is blasphemy, and that optimism is Christianity. Throw some light on the night ocean. If you cannot be a lantern swinging in the rigging, be one of the tiny phosphori back of the keel.

Shine! "Let your light so shine before men that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father which is in Heaven."
Make one person happy every day and do that for twenty years and you will have made seven thousand, three hundred happy.
You know a man who has lost all his property by an unfortunate investment, or by putting his name on the back of a friend's note? After you have taken a brief nap, which every man and woman is entitled to on a Sunday afternoon, go and cheer up that man. You can, if God helps you, say something that will do him good after both of you have been dead a thousand years.

Shine! You know of a family with a bad boy who has run away from home. Go before night and tell that father and mother the parable of the prodigal son, and that some of the illustrious and useful men now in church and state had a silly passage in their lives and ran away from home. Shine!
You know of a family that has lost a child, and the silence of the nursery glooms the whole house from cellar to garret. Go before night and tell them how much that child has happily escaped, since the most prosperous life on earth is a struggle.
Shine! You know of some one who likes you, and you like him, and he ought to be a Christian. Go tell him what religion has done for you, and ask him if you can pray for him. Shine! Oh, for a disposition so charged with sweetness and light that we cannot help but shine! Remember if you cannot be a leviathan lashing the ocean into fury, you can be one of the phosphori, doing your part toward making a path of phosphorescence. Then I will tell you what impression you will leave as you pass through this life and after you are gone. I will tell you to your face and not leave it for the minister who officiates at your obsequies.
The failure in all eulogium of the departed is that they cannot hear it. This, in substance, is what I or someone else will say of you on such an occasion: "We gather for offices of respect to this departed one.
It is impossible to tell how many tears he wiped away; how many burdens he lifted:

REV. H. T. CROSSLEY AND J. E. HUNTER, EVANGELISTS.

or how many souls he was under God instrumental in saving. His influence will never cease. We are all better for having known him. That pillow of flowers on the casket was presented by his Sabbath School class, all of whom he brought to Christ.
That cross of flowers at the head was presented by the Orphan Asylum which he befriended. Those three single flowers—one was sent by a poor woman for whom he bought a ton of coal, and one was by a waif of the street whom he rescued through the midnight mission, and the other was from a prison cell which he had often visited to encourage repentance in a young man who had done wrong. Those three loose flowers mean quite as much as the costly garlands now breathing their aroma through this saddened home, crowded with sympathizers. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." Or it if should be the more solemn burial at sea, let it be after the sun has gone down, and the captain has read the appropriate liturgy, and the ship's bell has tolled, and you are let down from the stern of the vessel into the resplendent phosphorescence at the wake of the ship. Then let some one say, in the words of my text, "He maketh a path to shine after him."

Two Consecrated Workers.

Messrs. Crossley and Hunter, "the Moody and Sankey" of Canada, and their Labors for Christ.

A GREAT revival of religion is now in progress in the city of Brooklyn. Not alone in one church, but in nearly all of the churches is there unusual evangelistic zeal and power. The union services at the noon-day hour are thronged, and in the evening, in many of the churches, earnest appeals are made to the unsaved to accept the Saviour. Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church is quite as deeply stirred as any, and is witnessing nightly scenes of stranger souls coming home to God. On Sunday, Jan. 7th, the two Canadian evangelists Revs. H. T. Crossley and J. E. Hunter began a series of special services, which have increased in interest and grown in power until this time. If he who wins souls is wise, then these devoted servants of the Master show highest wisdom, and are especially favored of God.
Certainly their coming to any church and community is a blessing and benediction to all who are privileged to enjoy their ministry. Jesus said, "And I if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me," and from beginning to end these brethren do nothing else but exhibit Jesus to their hearers.

Messrs. Crossley and Hunter, whose work has already been repeatedly mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, are regularly ordained and accredited clergymen of the Methodist Church in Canada. Called of God to this special work of evangelism, they not only went themselves, but they were sent by their brethren to this mission of saving men. For years they were pastors in important charges in their own country, and were working with other pastors in revival services, their own experiences in the regular work making them valuable assistants to the pastors. Mr. Crossley was born in Canada in 1830. He was converted in early life. At 19 he graduated from the Normal School at Toronto. Thence he went to the Victoria University. He was ordained and his pastoral work, in which he was very successful began. Ingersoll, St. Catharines, Hamilton and Brantford, will attest the thoroughness of his work. But a new door was opened, and since then he has devoted himself to evangelistic work in company with Mr. Hunter.

Mr. Hunter was born in Durham county, Ont., in 1836, was converted at the age of 15, and was a candidate for the ministry at 19. After completing his studies at Victoria University he was ordained in 1881, and spent two years in Manitoba as a missionary. On returning to Ontario, ten years ago, he united with Mr. Crossley in the revival work. For ten years these brethren have been true yoke-fellows in the Gospel.
In Canada, where much of their labor has been performed, they are universally popular. In Detroit and other American western cities, and at a number of places on the Pacific coast, their work has been most abundantly blessed of God. In November last they led a successful revival service in the Janet Methodist Episcopal Church, one of the largest of the denomination in Brooklyn.
The Church was greatly quickened, and hundreds professed faith in Christ and were added to the Church. They have received calls from many other eastern churches for similar work. They are specially fitted for working together. The masterful preaching and sweet singing of Mr. Crossley, and the irresistible appeals of Mr. Hunter, serve to make them indeed "workmen who need not to be ashamed." They have been called the "Moody and Sankey of Canada."

In witness of the efficacy of their singing and preaching it is only necessary to say that the distinguished Sir John McDonald, one of the ablest statesmen the Dominion has ever produced, and one of the best of men, professed faith in Christ at a great meeting held by these brethren in Ottawa, Canada. From every part of Ontario, from all the larger cities, and scores of the minor towns comes a record of many who have been brought into the fold. The same is true of many American cities.

Both evangelists have done something in the field of Christian authorship, and are planning for larger efforts in this direction.
Their entire influence is most wholesome and spiritually inspiring. Many stars, surely, will be in the crown of their rejoicing, for "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever."

earn money and supply them with food. The mother was lying sick in the hospital. Prospects of better times had seemingly been abandoned, and they accepted relief with tears of joy.

A few figures will serve to furnish an intelligent idea of the far-reaching work now being done by the Food Fund. Its territorial scope includes the most thickly populated sections of the East and West Sides of New York, from the Battery to 68th Street. It distributes 2,000 loaves daily at Relief Station No. 1, 500 at the East Eleventh Street Station, 500 at the Oliver Street Station and 2,000 at the Stuyvesant Street Station, and 1,500 to the homeless men of the Travelers' Club at 210 Eighth Avenue, a total of 6,500 loaves per day, or over 45,000 each week. Four coal, oil and wood stations have been established, viz: at No. 90 W. 3rd Street, where ten tons of coal and 1,000 bundles of wood per week are distributed, No. 210 8th Avenue, twenty tons of coal, 68th Street near Boulevard, ten tons of coal, No 12 Stuyvesant Street, ten tons of coal; at each of the three last named wood and oil are also distributed, the weekly amount of supplies given out at these stations being fifty tons of coal and 4,000 bundles of wood. In a number of cases where the applicants live at a distance from the coal station, coal and wood are ordered from the yard to the home. At the present writing, the weekly supplies for the thirteen relief stations, the four coal and wood station and other avenues of distribution now used by the Fund, are:

Loaves.....	45,000	Soap.....	1 ton
Flour.....	3 tons	Con. Milk, 2000 cns
Peas.....	5 tons	Bacon.....	4000 lbs
Outmeal.....	5 tons	Codfish.....	4000 lbs
Beans.....	5 tons	Coal.....	50 tons
Coffee.....	1 ton	Wood, 10000 b'ndls
Ten.....	500 lbs	Ker. Oil, 4000 gals
Sugar.....	3 tons	Clothing, 8000 pieces
Honey.....	3 tons	Salt.....	100 lbs.

The father of four children was found in a house on West Seventeenth street, sitting gloomily in the furthest corner of the bare, cheerless room they called "home." Weeks had passed since they had gathered around the table to a regular meal; weary weeks, in which the father had tramped the streets from sunrise till dark, looking for work. When the District Visitor from the Food Fund called, the mother—a woman, prematurely old and haggard through suffering—received her. The husband did not move from his corner, where he sat with his head buried in his hands.

"He is just like that, ma'am, for days past," said the woman, huskily. "He has threatened to kill himself, and oh! I'm afraid poor Joe'll do it. He hasn't been himself for more'n a week past."

A basket of groceries brought a gleam of sunshine into the humble home. Presently, the missionary explained to the sullen man the object of her visit.

"And you mean to tell me," he said gruffly, "that you're goin' to feed the wife and children till I get somethin' to do? You will? God bless you! Bless you!" and he fairly broke down in tears as he reached out and grasped the Visitor's hand. "I've been driven so that I got sick an' tired of it all, and had made up my mind to finish it in th' river. Ah, mum, you don't know what it is to have the little 'uns lookin' at yer every day an' gittin' thinner an' thinner and you can't give them even a bit to eat. It's that as kills the heart in us men, and makes us desp'rate."

Another caller was a former member of Dr. Klopsch's "Children's Class" in Sunday School. Although years had elapsed, recognition was mutual. She was greatly embarrassed at the necessity of asking for relief. "Please lend me three dollars," she pleaded, her face hovering between a smile and a tear, "but, oh, do not tell anybody! I will pay it back soon. We are willing to starve, but we must keep a roof over our darling baby somehow. Our landlady will turn us out unless we pay her to-day." The poor young mother, whose husband had vainly sought work for weeks, was helped by the payment of her rent.

Long continued privation invariably breeds sickness and in many of the homes visited by the Fund's missionaries cases were found that called for the attention of the physician. An experienced city practitioner has placed his services at the disposal of the Food Fund and will visit and prescribe for its patients without charge. It is proposed to engage the services of a medical missionary to devote her entire time to the Fund's work, dealing especially with the women and children. It has been a frequent experience with the Visitors to find some invalid in those workers' homes, lying on a poor, ill-furnished cot, in a room without fire or food, and without the slightest pretence of medical attendance. Where so many are struggling to get a crust to keep in the life or a bit of fuel to thaw out their numbed limbs, the sick have little chance of attention and still less of recovering. A few delicacies from the hand of a sympathetic visitor, a word of cheer, that invites them to renewed reliance upon the Divine Helper, often turn the ebbing tide of vitality. Such people are not likely to forget the Food Fund and its generous patrons.

In one home in West 18th St., a family was found in great need. Their credit was all run out at the grocer's, and the landlord had threatened to dispossess them the very next day, for non-payment of rent. The husband had just broken up the sofa to make a fire. The Fund arranged a payment on account of rent and also furnished some food.

The Death Angel had preceded the Food Fund's Visitor at one poor tenement home, in West Twenty-sixth street. In the front attic—an apartment with merely a table, a pallet, and stove, for furniture—lay a dead girl. Father, daughter and son had there fought out the battle of hopeless poverty and starvation, until the girl had succumbed. Rev. Stephen Merritt himself defrayed the cost of the funeral and conducted the services, and the Food Fund missionaries supplied the remaining members of the little family with a stock of groceries.

On the next block, West Twenty-seventh street, two sisters were found in a garret, almost famished and frozen. A timely gift of food and coal was undoubtedly the means of saving their lives, as they were too weak to last much longer, and had seemingly given up the fight. They were very grateful and declared that "one supply was enough for both."

In last week's issue, mention was made of the case of an aged mother and her consumptive daughter who were found starving in a tenement and were relieved by the Fund. The invalid, at parting, pleaded with the missionary to come again, adding: "You are like a ray of sunshine to me." When she did call, it was to find the old mother sitting by the lifeless body of the girl whose spirit had passed to that land where "they neither hunger nor thirst any more." The Fund buried the daughter and is caring for the stricken mother.

A touching case was that of a Mrs. H., whose husband was idle, coal out, cupboard bare and the mother very sick. They were threatened with eviction for non-payment of rent. A compromise was effected with the landlord, and coal and food were supplied. The woman, who is a good Christian, shared the supplies with a neighbor opposite who was as needy as herself.

One of the callers for help at the Fund headquarters was an honest mechanic. He would take nothing but bread, and only enough for one day. "I think," said he, "that I may get work by to-morrow, and I do not want to take what somebody else may need more than I. This is the first time in thirty-two years that I have been idle."

One poor widow, whose two little ragged bright-faced boys Mrs. Klopsch had clad, wept tears of gladness as she looked at her children. "It's the first time they've had a decent suit to wear since their father died, poor lads," she said. "Now they can go to Sunday School again. Ah, ma'am! if you knew how we've suffered, and pinched, and starved these weeks past, you would n't wonder at them being so badly off for clothes!" In a rear tenement-room, a mother was found with two pairs of twins, the oldest pair being only a little over two years, and all four, as well as the other members in the household, the mother included, literally famishing. Food was supplied by the Fund, the needs of the twins being specially remembered.

A truly pitiful case, which told more eloquently than words of the sufferings of mother and her babe, came up at Relief Station No. 1. A pale and care-worn mother with a sickly child in her arms, applied for help. When asked by the kindly missionary at the desk what she wanted, she replied, in a voice sunk almost to a whisper: "Ah, ma'am, I need everything! I have nothing at all, my baby and I. See, and she touched her hollow bosom meaningly, "I have nothing to give, even here. My strength is gone, and there is no nourishment, but it keeps the little one quiet."

And her simple story was more than born out by the wasted face and shrunken limb of the infant in her arms, whose supernaturally large eyes turned appealingly to her own as she spoke.

The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have come to the rescue of the destitute New York with a generosity beyond all precedent. Almost everyone has something to give, no matter how little, either in money, clothing, or other supplies. In some part of the country, money being scarce, farmers, millers, merchants and others have begun to collect corn and wheat, with a view to forwarding it to New York to be distributed through the Food Fund. We have already received by mail from several parts of the country where collections of this kind are in progress. Mr. S. S. Haury, M.D., writes us from Moundridge, Kan.: "Enclosed send you a draft for $10 to be used for the destitute in your city through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund. I would also ask your advice in reference to sending flour from here to the Food Fund, direct. I think upon short notice, we could make up a carload of flour, say 20,000 pounds, in our little town and vicinity. We can get flour from all the neighboring farmers where we could not get money."

D. C. Sturm, general merchant of Wilkesville, O., writes: "We are to have a meeting next week, and would like to hear from you by that time. We thought we could make up the greater part of a carload of wheat or flour for the Food Fund. Perhaps you can get the railroads to carry it free."

These propositions afford substantial hope for doing a most excellent work through the Fund. We have no doubt that single carloads of flour might be raised in different parts of the country, through the co-operation of the friends of the Fund, each contributing his quota in sacks or barrels. All flour consigned to the Fund, on reaching New York, will be baked into loaves and distributed in that form. Those of our readers who contemplate getting up a carload, would do well to apprise us promptly.

Contributions in money received during the week are acknowledged on this and the following page, and gifts of clothing, etc., on page 119.

SELLING THE BIRTHRIGHT.

S. S. Lesson for March 4. Gen. 25: 27-34. Golden Text, Luke 12: 23. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD'S purpose to make man like himself and to unite him with himself received further development in the life of Abraham, the man who takes a greater place than any other in the glorious Heb. 11, in which chapter the men of faith "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their father." Abraham had sought a wife for Isaac taken from a far country, and a true type of the "bride, the Lamb's wife." To this marriage God gave two sons, twins, yet Esau was the elder, and the birthright the position of elder son, was his by nature. As descended from Abraham the father of them that believe, as one in the line of which the Seed of the woman and Abraham's Seed should come, Esau's birthright was something more than ordinary, but Esau had no eyes to see it, no spiritual perceptions which would appreciate such a distinction. Esau is the main thing which recalls his history. Esau was "a cunning hunter, a man of the field." He had inherited from his father a love of good eating. "Isaac loved Esau because he did eat of his venison," and the desires of the flesh in the son superseded all which could have drawn him towards the pilgrim life led by his fathers when God was not ashamed to be called their God. Like the rich man (Luke 16: 19), who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day, he lived for the things of time and sense, as though God had created him for nothing higher. "Jacob was a plain man dwelling in tents," and Rebekah, his mother, loved him. His tasks were domestic, he was often in his mother's company, and probably as far as her power went, she trained him for God; and the first opportunity he had of prizing what Esau was indifferent to, proved that he had an eye to the unseen, the promises of God.

"And Jacob sold pottage; and Esau came from the field, and he was faint. And Esau said to Jacob: Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage, for I am faint." It would have been only a brotherly thing to do if Jacob had freely given all that he had prepared to his brother, but Jacob had an eye to the birthright, and would secure it at any cost. He saw his opportunity, and, unhandsome, mean as it was, he took advantage of his brother, and said: "Sell me this day thy birthright." Jacob knew whom he had to deal with; he was conscious how little value was that birthright in Esau's eyes, while to him it was more than life, and no doubt there was in his mind the sophistical argument that he could not wrong Esau in taking from him what was worthless in his eyes. Yet Jacob, right as he was in his estimation and appreciation of that which was of value in the eyes of God, set about obtaining it in a purely human way. God had indeed said to Rebekah regarding her sons: "The elder shall serve the younger," and no doubt the fond mother had told this to her son, and awakened in him an ambition to possess the birthright. But

Why Forestall God?

He has always a way to fulfill his promise and to accomplish whatever he has said. All the mean advantage which Jacob took of Esau did not really hasten matters; and it sowed the seed for a disunion in the family which had the gravest results. But it manifested a profane mind in Esau—father as he is of the carnal rationalists of this day—when, in answer to his brother's proposal: "Sell me this day thy birthright," he replied, "Behold I am at the point to die; and what profit shall this birthright do to me?" Are we, "children of God, and if children then heirs,"—awake to the dignity of our birthright? Are we aware of the place God calls us to in his mighty universe as being the begotten of God; "a kind of firstfruits of his creatures?" (James 1: 18). Do we measure the things of daily life as to whether they are worthy or unworthy of heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ? Or does some red pottage, some thing of earth, some consideration, which has a value only for a moment, outweigh with us the dignity and importance of our near relationship to God? Do we say by our worldly or indifferent lives: "What profit shall this birthright do to me?" Are we alive to the fact that by our birthright and by no other way, do we come into the possession of God's promises? We are exhorted to be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience

Inherit the Promises.

The faith and patience which would have distinguished a true son of Abraham were lacking in Esau. Impatient, impulsive, he could wait for nothing and for nobody, not even for God. He must have his desire in the present moment. If the birthright did not bring him present satisfaction; it was nothing to him. Faith and patience failed him, he got his pottage and lost the birthright. Therefore, while God delights to call himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, he never calls himself the God of Esau. And Esau is never called an heir of promise.

There are now, as there were in old time, men and women whose very presence says: "God lives, God is real, God reigns, God keeps his promises." Voluntarily or involuntarily, men are brought near to God by such people. A house, a meeting, a congregation, a railway carriage, feels the effect of their presence, and behind their back, their worst enemies will own that God is with them. But these are such as value their birthright, they account it of more importance, a thousand times, to be born of God than to have royal blood in their veins; they have long-sighted eyes, accustomed to look out upon things eternal, and "God is not ashamed to be called their God," and to constitute them his true witnesses on earth.

But in the Christian Church of our day, are there not many more Esaus than Abrahams? How many there are who, for comforts, position, business or reputation, some messes of pottage, let slip their birthright as Esau did: "For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears." (Heb. 12: 17.) Are we aware of

of God's highest calling? We are heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ, if so be, that we suffer with him. If not? "Our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory while we look, not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen." It is possible to despise our birthright: it is possible to come short of the high calling of God, to which we are called; it is possible to be Esaus, and such cannot fail to be "ashamed before the Lord at his coming." When some are taken, they will be left. "Take heed, to yourselves," says our Lord, "lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." (Luke 21: 34, 35.)

Begotten of God, born of incorruptible seed, partakers of the Divine nature! Have we taken in what all this means? Do we understand and value our heavenly origin? If so, we shall be "not of the world even as he was not of the world," and the world will know us not as it knew him not. Form, doctrine, an outside, or a superficially spiritual religion, will satisfy those who have never understood their birthright. But those who are awakened by the Holy Ghost to their divine origin, their real heavenly calling, can afford to leave the "pottage" and "endure hardships;" they can afford to lose the approbation of men; they can afford to walk as Enoch and Noah did, alone with God. Let us take heed, lest in these last days of our dispensation we should, through ignorance of the Scripture, or through love of the world, fail to make our calling and election sure. Esau would have repented, but he had not the opportunity. The foolish virgins went for the oil when it was too late.

It is a poor excuse to make that you live as most Christians live. We have the Word of God, and the example of our Lord, as our true guide. Even Jacob, faulty as he was, saw the birthright, he did appreciate that which Esau had no eyes to see. Let us not wait until we are satisfied with our own holiness before we answer to our vocation.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE LENTIL.

JACOB is supposed to have been about thirty years old when the events of the lesson occurred. Abraham was dead and Isaac was prematurely aged, with none of the vigor of his father. Jacob's character at this time, and for many years afterwards, was a composite of spirituality and cunning. Such characters still exist, and often bring religion into contempt. The privileges of birthright, which he demanded of his brother Esau, as the price of his savory stew, are better understood in monarchical lands than in our own, and by the ancients than the moderns. The eldest son in a family was treated with marked consideration. He was regarded as the future head of the house. At his father's death, his share of the estate was twice as large as that of any of his brothers, and, if he died before his father, leaving children, his eldest son inherited his place and fortune. They did not pass to his younger brother. There are two characters in the story and two lessons may be learned from each. As to Jacob: It is wrong to take advantage of any man's necessities. Realizing Esau's urgent need of food and having it in his possession, he demanded a fabulous and ruinous price for it. In greater or less degree that is done still; but the practice is not only cruel but immoral. Second: It is not right to adopt wrong measures to bring about good ends. Rebekah had been told that Jacob would be the head of the family and that Esau's descendants would serve those of Jacob. She would not have been the woman she was if she did not tell Jacob of the prediction. Probably, he thought that as it was God's will that he should have the birthright, he was justified in bringing that will to pass. But God did not need his assistance in promoting the fulfillment of the prophecy and especially not so cruel and unbrotherly an expedient as this. In marked contrast to Jacob's conduct was that of David in the cave of Engedi. (1. Sam. 24: 1-6.) When Saul was at his mercy and David knew that the kingdom was to be his, and his men urged him to kill his treacherous enemy, he refused and God worked out the fulfillment of his promise in his own way. Jacob was not so patient and he had to suffer for his presumption. As to Esau: A great loss may come from preferring a present good to a future advantage. People are doing this every day in living for this life and neglecting the life to come—preferring time to eternity. Second: Esau thought more of his body than of his soul. He must have known what great things were promised of God to the family; yet he thought so little of the privilege of being the head of it, that he sold it for a meal. The body is always clamorous for indulgence and the more clamorous the more it is indulged. The wise man brings it into subjection. Every child ought to be encouraged to develop and strengthen the control of the soul over the body. If that were done, he would not be the slave of his appetite when he grows to manhood. His body would not compel him to drink, or to be vicious, when his spirit bade him refrain and he would not have to make the humiliating confession we so often hear, "I cannot resist." Every one whose life is controlled by his physical nature yields his birthright as a son of God, as foolishly as Esau did.

Pottage of Lentiles. The lentile is an annual plant, with a weak stalk, rising about eighteen inches in height, having pinnate leaves at each joint. Small flowers come out of the sides of the branches on short peduncles and are succeeded by short legumes, containing flat, circular seeds curved in the middle. (The word lens probably is derived from them). These seeds, Dr. Thompson says, easily dissolve in boiling and form a red or chocolate colored pottage, much esteemed in Northern Africa and Western Asia. Dr. Kitto said he had often eaten this pottage or stew and had found it better food than a stranger would imagine. Ezek. 4: 9 indicates that lentiles were often used as bread in times of scarcity. The "Revalenta Arabica," which is still sold in American stores, is the modern form of the Lentile. In some Roman Catholic countries the lentile forms a staple diet during Lent, and it has been suggested that the season derives its name from the practice. An English authority on food-supplies speaks highly of the nourishing quality of the lentile, and says that for ten dollars a person could have the red pottage of Esau every day for a year. It thus appears that Esau made a poor bargain when he sold his birthright for one dish of it.

Sell me thy birthright. It was a selfish and unbrotherly demand. Bishop Burnett used to tell a story in striking contrast to this of Jacob. It was that of Sergeant Glanvil. He said that Glanvil's father left him the whole of his estate in his will, although he was the second son. His reason for doing so was that his eldest son was a scapegrace who was likely to waste the property in riotous living. After the father's death the eldest son reformed. Sergeant Glanvil watched his brother carefully and became convinced that the reformation was genuine and permanent. He then invited friends to a great feast in the old ancestral mansion. The place of honor was reserved for the disinherited elder brother. At the height of the feast, Sergeant Glanvil ordered a special dish of old gold plate to be set before his elder brother and invited him to uncover it. The guests looked in wonder as they saw it full of parchments. The younger brother rose and said: "I am about to do what I am sure my father would have done, if he had lived to see that happy change which you all see in my brother. Therefore I freely restore to him the whole estate."

I am at the point to die. To save his life Esau sacrificed his birthright. The alternative of death or renunciation of the heavenly birthright has confronted many since his day and hundreds have proved by choosing death that they valued their birthright more than life itself. The story of one is a type of many others. It is that of Pancratius who was born in Phrygia. He was brought up to worship Jupiter; but he became a convert to Christianity. He inherited a vast fortune from his father and was entitled to high privileges. Diocletian was then persecuting the Christians and when he heard that Pancratius was become a Christian, he sent for him to expostulate with him and by promises of advancement win him back to heathenism. Pancratius went to the palace. The youth replied firmly that none of the things offered him were worthy to be compared with the glories that would be his if he remained faithful. Then the Emperor said that unless he offered incense to Jupiter he should be immediately put to death. "It is hard to die," said the youth; "but I am a Christian and I will not be false to Christ." He was led out to the Aurelian Way and there put to death by the sword.

Thus Esau despised his birthright. So have many done since Esau's day. Cardinal Mazarin was one of them. In the zenith of his power he realized the fact. His physician told him that a fatal disease had developed which in two months would bring him to his grave. Brienne, his attendant, saw him, shortly after he had heard the news, walking up and down his picture gallery wringing his hands and weeping bitterly. Pausing before one masterpiece after another, which had been collected at immense cost, he cried: "How can I leave all these?" As the time of his death drew near, his distress increased. He moaned, "Oh, my poor soul, what will become of thee? Whither wilt thou go? Had I my life to live again, I would be a monk instead of a courtier." The favors of the world have undone me.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE GATEWAY OF INDIA.

RUSSIAN forces numbering forty-one thousand men were said recently to be massed near Herat in preparation for an assault on the city. The report was contradicted soon after its publication, but in the interval, it gave rise to some very gloomy forebodings. It was perceived that the great European war so long predicted and dreaded might easily originate in that far-away place. That England would tamely consent to Russia seizing the Afghan city, no one believed; and that Russia, having seized it, would give it up without a hard fight was equally improbable. War between Russia and England seemed inevitable if Herat became a Russian stronghold; and in such a war other Powers might become involved. A glance at the map will show why England should be concerned in the possession of an Afghan city. Herat is called the gateway of India. It stands practically at the head of a defile through which alone India could be invaded on the west side. The frontier is protected by mountains and deserts, but through Herat, an invading army could easily be poured into the valleys of India. Russia has for many years been stealthily pushing her conquests in the direction of the Afghan city, and England has been warned from time to time that its capture could be easily achieved from the Russian advanced posts. So long as Herat remains in possession of the ruler of Afghanistan, she is content, but if it passed into Russian hands the Indian Empire would be in danger. England is well aware of the fact, and therefore the news that the Russians were menacing the city was regarded as the signal for war. This concern for the outposts and the vulnerable points of an empire might be commended to the Christian who is menaced by the great enemy of souls. No man becomes a backslider all at once. It is by indulging in what are called little sins, in adopting worldly principles, and in curtailing and then omitting private prayer, that the believer loses his power to resist when temptation assails his heart. (11. Cor. 2: 11.)

The Expensive Deserter.

The problem of dealing with deserters from the army has, says a despatch from Washington, D. C., received considerable attention from Secretary Lamont. Under the present system the War Department pays a reward for the arrest of a soldier who runs away from the service, and hardly a week passes without some civil authority at a remote place reporting the arrest of a deserter. Sixty dollars is paid for each deserter captured, and those who are serving a term of confinement at Fort Leavenworth cost $30,000 for their apprehension. There is now a proposition that deserters be allowed to go their way. There are those who think that the $30,000 spent in arresting them and paying the cost of transportation and their confinement at Leavenworth, might be used to make the army more attractive to the enlisted men. If the Department adopts this view there will probably be many desertions, but those who remain will be men who prefer the soldier's life. It is so in Christ's army. There is no compulsory service in it; but there is this difference that the deserter is invited to return and is assured of forgiveness. (Jer. 3: 12.)

Saved by a Dying Man.

A reminiscence of pioneer days in West Virginia is narrated by a correspondent of the "Youth's Companion." He says that one of the most famous hunters and surveyors of those times was a man named John Weitzel. One day, while returning in a canoe with one companion from an excursion to Middle Island Creek, he was hailed by a large party of Indians, and ordered to put ashore. Without making any reply he headed the boat for the middle of the stream, and with his companion, made every effort to escape. The Indians fired on the instant, and one of the bullets struck Weitzel in the body. Seeing at once that the wound was mortal, he ordered the other man to lie down in the canoe, and then, with renewed vigor, though his life was ebbing fast, he pulled for the opposite shore. The Indians fired another volley, but without effect, and before they could reload, the boat was out of range. Weitzel expired soon after reaching the bank, and was buried by his companion. Not many men in the presence of death would have been thus concerned about the safety of another. It was such self-forgetfulness that Christ displayed when in the agonies of his crucifixion he provided for the future of his mother, gave comfort to the penitent thief and prayed for his murderers. (Matt. 27: 42.)

A New Identity.

An extraordinary discovery has been made recently by a clerk employed in the Grand Central Depot, New York. He is twenty-four years of age and has been in the service of the company for several years. He believed himself to be an orphan but he finds that he is the son of a wealthy merchant of Oil City, Pa. It appears that at his birth his parents were in grievous trouble and confided him to the care of their nurse,

The Boston 'Traveler' says, that half a century ago one of the brightest and most beautiful of Salem's girls was engaged to a young man who was in prosperous circumstances in the town. He was, however, eager to make a large fortune and determined to go West. He wanted the girl to marry him and go with him, but she was averse to leaving the town. She wished him to remain, as he was doing well, but if he was fully resolved on going, he would be more likely to succeed if he were unmarried. She thought, too, that they were too young to be married then and promised to wait faithfully for his return. The young man could not be persuaded to remain and still urged the girl to marry and go with him. He doubted whether she would be true to him in his absence. The girl was piqued by his doubts and in a hasty moment declared that she would never go out of the house until he came for her. He went away, prospered, and forgetting the girl waiting for him, married a Western lady and did not go back to Salem. The girl kept her vow. Only once in fifty years was she seen outside the house and that was when a fire occurred and she was dragged out by force. A few days ago, she died, having been a voluntary prisoner for over half a century. It is a pity that she should have persisted in keeping her vow after learning that her lover was unworthy of her. Such one-sided devotion is very rare. We are only too familiar with the contrast among those who profess to have given themselves to Christ, yet who are false to parts of God's universe exists in the monkey world. The inference may therefore be drawn that in that world beyond the grave to which we go, the same principle is in operation and the increased capabilities will be furnished with increased power of movement and expression. Puzzling questions about heaven are often asked, but they need occasion no anxiety to the believer. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he appeareth we shall be like him." (1. John 3: 2.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Sixty Thousand copies of the Bible were sold last year in the Turkish Empire, in which there are 892 Protestant schools.

Mr. Herman Warszawski, who is now in charge of the Hebrew Christian Church in St. Mark's Place, New York, will be glad to accept invitations to speak in New York or Brooklyn churches on Sunday mornings or week-evenings in the interest of Jewish missions.

The Irish People spent in intoxicating liquor last year a larger sum than they paid for rent. A journal published in Ireland mentions one village in the south of the island which has 1,200 inhabitants, and supports fifty-two saloons. It maintains a force of thirty-two policemen.

A series of Lectures on Timely Religious Topics has been commenced in the Wylie Memorial Church, Philadelphia. The lecturers are the Professors of Princeton University who have been invited to speak by the ministers of the city in the hope of checking the progress of scepticism. The first lecture was by President Patton on "Supernatural Religion." The lectures will be delivered on Sunday afternoons, and will continue till the middle of April.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings at Milton, Pa., closed on Feb. 7th. Eight churches united in the work and all have been benefited largely by the meetings. They continued for two weeks increasing from day to day in interest and in the number of inquirers. Dr. Munhall is now at Jamestown, N. Y., where a similar work has begun. The evangelist's methods are well considered and his uniform success wherever he has labored shows that they are owned and used of God.

Rev. J. C. Redding of York, Neb., has been holding very successful meetings at Osage City, Kan. They were held in the Opera House, which seats about 800 persons, but it would not accommodate all who came and an overflow meeting was held in the Methodist Episcopal Church which was also filled. Many persons have made profession of faith as a result of the meetings.

A Cable Dispatch informs us that Mrs. M. Baxter and Pastor, and Mrs. Stockmayer are on their way to this country to hold evangelistic meetings and are expected to arrive Feb. 23rd. Mrs. Baxter's articles on the Sunday School lessons which appear weekly in this journal have already made her known to the American public and will insure her a warm welcome from our readers.

The Report of the Bible Institute of Chicago for 1893, shows that the number of students during the year was 376 of whom one-third were women. No less than thirty-five denominations were represented among the students. Classified by nationality the following countries were represented besides the United States and Canada: Great Britain, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, India, Japan, Persia and Hawaii.

The following contributions of clothing, etc., for the Relief Fund are acknowledged:

THE CITY AND FORTRESS OF HERAT, IN AFGHANISTAN, THE MILITARY GATEWAY OF INDIA.

a young widow whose home was in New York. She brought him to this city and took care of him. It is supposed that she became attached to the boy, for when, a year later, she married again, she told her husband that he was her own child by her former marriage. Two years ago she died and about a year afterward her husband, being about to re-marry, sent to the young man a trunk containing her belongings. He examined them and found at the bottom of the trunk a package of old letters, which, to his surprise, concerned himself. From these he learned for the first time, that she was not his mother, and gained a clue to his true parentage. He went to Oil City and after some inquiries discovered his parents who were overjoyed to find that he was still alive. They had searched for him but having failed to find him or the woman to whose care they had confided him, thought he must be dead. If the young man had not read those old letters he would have missed the joy of reunion with his parents and also the improvement in his prospects in life, which the reunion brings him. Infinitely greater are the blessings people miss who neglect to read God's Word. From its pages they might learn that they have a heavenly Father who loves them and longs for them to come to him that he may give them true riches. (Isa. 63: 16.)

their vows though he changes not and daily loads them with benefits. (Mal. 3: 6, 7.)

Monkey Language.

On his return from Africa where he went to study the monkeys of the forests, Prof. Garner was asked what were the results of his expedition. He says in reply that he passed several weeks in the heart of a great forest, shut up in a strong cage, which he took with him to protect himself from night attacks of wild beasts. There, he made the acquaintance of gorillas, chimpanzees and other kinds of monkeys, and listened to their talk. He found, as he had expected, that they have a language as much their own as ours and that it is suited to their conditions, but does not resemble human speech any more than the monkey resembles a human being. Some of the sounds they make cannot be represented by any known alphabet, although it would not be difficult to invent signs for them. The monkeys, the Professor says, are not sociable and do not attempt to carry on connected conversation. The brown monkey talks most, but even he expresses himself in the simplest and most direct way. Some persons have said that the monkey can express nothing but emotion and desire. The Professor's experience, however, has convinced him that the monkey is capable of expressing all that he is capable of thinking, which is all that man can do. It is evident from Prof. Garner's story that the wonderful adaptation of means to powers and purposes which exists in all

NEW USES FOR OLD TOOLS.

A Sermon Preached last Sunday morning by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text: Judges 3: 31. "And after him was Shamgar the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad: and he also delivered Israel."

THE subject to be presented this morning brings before us a strange story of the olden time. It is a story which suggests to us rude manners, fierce conflicts, and cruel conquests. It is a story which shows us how God's people prospered when they were right with God, and how they were defeated when they turned away from God and served the gods of their idolatrous neighbors. It is also a story which illustrates what one man may do for his country, his faith, and his God, when his heart is brave and his arm strong; and chiefly when God is on his side, for "if God be for us, who can be against us?" The condition of the country at this time was sad indeed; the Israelites were greatly oppressed and correspondingly depressed. Their enemies had so overrun the country that it was almost useless to till the soil or to sow seed, as in no case could a profitable harvest be secured. The highways were so infested with robbers that they were well-nigh deserted by all others. The people were obliged to go in by-ways and in the dark and thus stealthily to creep about. They could not in open day go to the public wells, for their enemies had surrounded them; and finally many of the people were obliged to hide in inaccessible dens in the mountains.

God's Chosen Man.

At this sad time Shamgar was the man chosen of God and appointed to be the deliverer of his people. In every crisis God has the right man ready to come forward, perform his work, and honor God's great name. When Israel is to be led out of Egypt God has Moses trained for leadership. So God prepared and called Joshua, David, Solomon, Elijah, and Elisha. In like manner, in due time, he called Paul and Augustine. In later days Calvin and Luther; then Wesley and Whitefield. God has use for the rough mountaineers of Lebanon to hew down the cedars, as truly as for Hiram's cunning Tyrian workmen to mould the brass and to carve the fretwork for the Temple. God calls men who are engaged in lowly work to nobler service; thus he called Moses from the flocks of Jethro to his high commission, and Gideon from the threshing floor to achieve national triumph. God called Peter, John and Andrew from their nets to be fishers of men; and Matthew from the receipt of custom to be an evangelist and an apostle; so God called Shamgar. He seems to have been engaged in ploughing when the grander work was presented.

God puts before us all great possibilities, but he makes greatness in our present calling a necessary preparation for taking advantage of our great opportunities. Doors of opportunity open quickly to the touch of industry. Only as we are faithful in lowly spheres do we show that we are worthy of promotion to higher ranges of duty; our divine Lord formulated this great law when he said: "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." God always loves and approves busy and faithful men; and such men are always an inspiration and a benediction. The world is constantly looking for such men; and there is no corner of the universe sufficiently obscure long to hide men of worth and power. God reaches his hand to such men; churches, banks, great corporations, call loudly, winsomely and authoritatively for such men. Great institutions are anxious to promote men whose character and ability make them essential to the highest prosperity of these institutions. But the greatest unkindness that a business house, a corporation, a church, or a nation can do, is to promote to a lofty place, a man who is unfitted for the position. Such a man may hide his defects in private life, but when exalted to a high place his deficiencies become painfully conspicuous.

A good record for faithful service is one of the best diplomas which any young man can possess; years of faithful service become rounds of the ladder up which a man may climb to the highest place. Every man should strive to make himself indispensable to his employer. A man in my study recently said: "I can speak nine languages and I can read thirteen, but I cannot earn my own living; all my diplomas will not make the pot boil, except I were to put them all under it at one time and consume them in a grand conflagration." This man was unfitted by practical experience, by sound common sense, and by years of earnest service for any position requiring varied intellectual and practical abilities. We ought all to strive for that strange something which secures success. There is force in Carlyle's emphasis of the real meaning of the word "king," he is the "canning man"—the man who can do it. He is the able man, whether or not we can analyze and define the subtle elements which constitute his real abilities. Napoleon was accustomed to ask, when applicants for various positions came to him, "What have you done?" and the answer to that question determined to a great degree, the position which the applicant might expect.

We sometimes say that circumstances make men; but as usually understood this statement is incorrect. If circumstances alone made men there would be a great many more men made, for there certainly are circumstances enough. Circumstances make men only as men use their opportunities, as they overcome unfavorable circumstances and take advantage of those which conduce to the highest success. Circumstances are like the laws of gravitation; they may make or unmake us. If we put ourselves in line with these great laws they will bear us on to prosperity; if we oppose them their irresistible momentum will crush us in their onward progress. Work and worth are

The True Standard of Value.

Cost and worth are ever close neighbors. If we want pebbles we can pick them up by the handful almost anywhere, but when possessed they are only pebbles. If we want diamonds we must dig for them. Why is an ounce of gold of more value than an ounce of lead? Simply because it takes more work to get an ounce of gold than it takes to get an ounce of lead. Many men want the honors of wealth and education, but they are not willing to pay the price for both in hard labor; they want noontide honors from men; but they are not willing to pay the price in burning midnight oil. In like manner, there are many who want the blessings of a Christian life but they are not willing to pay the price in self-renunciation and in Christian service; they want the crown, but they will not bear the cross. But no man shall wear yonder crown with its glittering gems, except he take up Christ's cross with its cruel nails. This is an eternal law. Will you to-day take up this cross? If you do one day you shall wear the crown. I would that all who hear me this day feel the force of these plain and homely truths. I am always disheartened when I hear young men talk as if they trusted to luck for success. Luck is a fool; pluck is a hero. Only fools trust in the god of luck. When I hear a young man speak as if he believed himself to be the possessor of genius which relieves him from the necessity of doing hard work, I have little hope for him; and when I find that his mother agrees with him, I have less hope for either him or her. Shamgar was a patient, plodding industrious man. We need such men in the church; men who go on ploughing even though the enemies of Christ are numerous and powerful; even though the friends of Christ are fearful and faithless. Carey, our immortal missionary, when asked the reason of his success, answered in three words, "I can plod." Plodding, with the blessing of God, made Carey. Plodding and fighting made the ploughman, Shamgar, the judge of Israel.

Bravery as well as Industry.

Shamgar was also a very brave man. His enemies were many and strong; the friends of liberty were few and weak. But he did not lose hope nor turn away from duty. He kept right on performing his duty in his lowly sphere, until God gave him the opportunity for rendering greater service. If he had been a coward he had not been a ploughman in his discouraging circumstances; if he had been a coward when the six hundred Philistines came in sight, he would have been out of sight as fast as his feet could carry him. But no coward was Shamgar the ploughman; he trusted that God would deliver Israel; and he determined to do his part toward securing the deliverance for which he hoped and prayed. It is barely possible that we are not to understand that he attacked these six hundred Philistines alone; perhaps all that is meant by the language here used is that he put himself at the head of a band of peasants armed with ox-goads and other rude implements, and with the help of these won the glorious victory. It is common for us to ascribe to a leader what is accomplished under his leadership. With the help of his associates he made the desperate assault and slew six hundred of his and their enemies. This brave act secured a temporary respite for him and his people, as it struck terror into the hearts of the rebellious Canaanites. We all need similar bravery in

Our Christian Conflicts.

We have foes many and strong which we must destroy or they will destroy us. We must fight against the world, the flesh and the devil; and these three foes will come to us in many forms. They will sometimes come even as angels of light; but we must be quick to recognize real foes under fair faces, and we must cut and hew them without hesitancy or mercy. As much courage is needed in the Christian life as on the field of battle. Many a man could walk boldly to the cannon's mouth who would hesitate to affirm his faith in the presence of jeering men or fair but foolish women. Glorious moral victories are lost for the want of prompt and unwavering courage. We should be as bold for Christ as are the servants of Satan for their cruel master. It is a pity that so many Christians play the coward and the fool, when they should be heroes and victors. We all love a man with the courage of his convictions. Bravery is contagious. We all feel the influence of a brave, noble, consecrated life, the moment we are brought into its atmosphere. I believe with Dr. Holmes that the atmosphere for a considerable distance, perhaps for several feet, around a brave man is charged with inspiration. Science has enabled us to measure the degree of heat which is generated in a firefly's flash; and the time may come when science will enable us to measure the amount of inspiration or of depression generated by the heroes or cowards whom we meet. Whatever we may call this influence, its existence can scarcely be denied. I know of men whose presence cheers, inspires and exalts me. I love to meet them on the street; there are others who take power, life and hope out of you. You might almost as well give them your arm and let them take from you a pint of blood as to give them a portion of your time, and let them take from you your courage and hope. Shamgar seems to have inspired other men to brave and noble deeds; he stimulated them to serve God and to save their native land. He mourned over the deserted villages and the inaccessible wells and the discouraged people of the land. Now he comes forth to be a deliverer. God made his hand strong and his heart brave. God multiply the Shamgars in all our churches.

The Old Tools.

Shamgar was skilful in the use of the weapon which he had. He had only an ox-goad with which to attack the foe. He might have pleaded the inadequacy of his weapon as an excuse for refusing to attack the foe; but he was not that kind of a man. The word translated "ox-goad" is from a root which literally means "an instructor of oxen"; it was an instrument which brought oxen into obedience. Sometimes it has been translated a coulter or a plough-share; and the ox-goad still used in Palestine is a weapon which if wielded by a strong hand may be very destructive. Some of these ox-goads are from eight to ten feet long, and at the largest end they are often six inches in circumference. The shaft is frequently made of an oak sapling. These goads are armed at the smaller end with a sharp prickle for driving the oxen, and at the other end with a small paddle or spade of iron for cleaning the plough from the clay which often sticks to the share. It was probably with such a goad that Shamgar made his terrible assault.

We are constantly excusing ourselves from doing our duty because we do not, as we claim, possess proper facilities for our work. We charge our failure on our condition, on our partners, on our companions, on anybody or anything except ourselves. This is an old trick. The came into the world with sin. "The woman thou gavest me," said Adam in the ungallant and cowardly spirit induced by his heinous sin. It is easy to see that in blaming the woman, Adam really meant to blame God. This is the tendency of sin in every age and country. This tendency reveals itself to-day when men talk unwisely of heredity and environment; there are elements of truth in both, but as often used they are made practically to excuse man and virtually to accuse God for our weakness and sinfulness. We are all following too closely the example of Adam in this respect. A poor carver always has a dull knife. Many a man says, "if my circumstances were different I could easily be a Christian; if I only had large amounts of money I could be generous." We ought at once to stop such weak and wicked speech. If we will not serve God in the circumstances in which we are placed, we would not serve him in changed conditions. If we will not obey God now, we would have disobeyed him in Eden. We may as well discontinue chasing Adam up and down the centuries and turn our thoughts to our own weak disobedience and wicked rebellion against God. We may as well understand at once that for our want of success in the Christian life, we are ourselves to blame. The words of Shakespeare, illustrate, at least to some degree, every man's experience:

Men at some time are masters of their fates,
The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

Part of our duty in life is to overcome every unfavorable tendency and every inhospitable environment. We ought to develop skill in the use of the instruments, the opportunities, the circumstances with which we stand connected. It is a glorious thing to snatch victory from the jaws of defeat; to make hostile conditions the ground of glorious triumphs; to recast all our circumstances so as to make them the inspiration of heroic struggle and glorious victory. Skill in the use of the weapons that we possess, we ought to study to acquire. I love to see how Shamgar won victory with a comparatively powerless instrument; he found a new use for an old tool. Many of the discoveries in astronomy, chemistry, mathematics, navigation and science generally were made with very imperfect instruments. Dr. Valentine Mott's remarkable surgical skill is the more honorable because of his comparatively poor instruments. True genius shows itself in accomplishing grand results with imperfect tools. In Exodus 4: 2, the Lord said to Moses, "What is in thy hand?" The answer of Moses was, "a rod." This rod became mighty when used by Moses in obedience to the Word of God; stretched out over the Red Sea, it was the symbol of God's power by which the waters were piled up on either side in crystal walls, while the people of God passed through on dry land. What is in thy hand, David? Only a sling. But a sling in the trained hand of David was really a mighty weapon; mightier far at a distance than the sword of Goliath. David in the armor of Saul would have been a powerless antagonist; but David with his sling was more than a match for Goliath. Here are pebbles taken from the brook; a moment more and one of them goes singing through the air, and a new idea enters Goliath's head; there was to him a whole sermon in that stone. What is in thy hand, Dorcas? Only a needle. Is a woman with a needle to be made immortal? God sees that woman's heart; God sees the glistening of that needle as it passes in and out of the garments. That needle is used for the Lord; those garments are made for the Lord's poor. The needle of Dorcas wrought for her an inscription, though not in brass or marble, but with thread on garments for the poor, yet one more durable than either ass or marble. Her eulogy will be read when the victories of Roman arms and the stories of Grecian arts are forgotten. Her edle served God as truly as does the pen the recording angel. What is in thy hand? A broom. Use it for God. The room of the domestic servant may be as truly used for God as was the sceptre of David or Solomon. What is in thy hand? A trowel, a hammer, an ax, a chisel, a saw, some other mechanical tool? Use it for God. Jesus Christ gave dignity to labor. The sweat-beads of honest toil stood on his brow. You may have the humblest home, a social life, and it may be more resplendent with the glory of an indwelling Christ than as the temple in all its grandeur. The God-carrier's ladder may be trodden by angels' feet, as truly as was the ladder which united heaven and earth in the vision of Jacob, and the God itself may be radiant with the glory of the Lord. What is in thy hand? A pen. A pen is mightier than the sword. The pen of Shakespeare, of Longfellow, of Whittier! Oh, matchless instrument! A pen in the hand of Harriet Beecher Stowe stabbed slavery to the heart. A pen in the hand of George Kennan to tell the story of Darkest Russia is mightier than the sword of the Czar of all the Russias. Have you a pen? Use it for God. Perhaps it is a type-writer. Touch its keys; make sweet music that shall echo around the globe. Lowly duties performed with lofty motive give life its true glory. We are all familiar with George Herbert's admirable expression of this thought:

A servant with this clause
Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room, as for thy laws,
Makes that and the action fine.

The church needs to exalt lowly forms of labor. We have often refused the work of God because we could not do, as we thought, some great thing for God. We need no new tools, but we need to give new uses to old tools. There is no sword like the sword of the Spirit. May God teach us how to use it! There is no hammer like God's Word. May God teach how to strike the irresistible blow! There is no throne of power like the pulpit; may God make his ministers truly kings and spirits! Away with the idea that we need new tools. We need grit and grace to use the old sword, the old hammer, the old fire, the old and always new Gospel. We must do little things for Jesus; must be like Jesus. Jesus did little things. He taught a Bible class; he gave more time to two men on the way from Jerusalem to Emmaus than he ever gave to any others, so far as we know, during the period between his resurrection and his ascension, expounding the Old Testament, teaching a class of two members. Jesus, after healing a poor blind man, went out and found him when he had been cast out of the synagogue and revealed to him his divine name and love. Oh! can you not find some poor soul to-day who does not know Jesus? Can you not tell some wanderer about the Christ? Oh, men and women! Tell the old, old story. You do not want to have starless crowns. God help you to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. What is in thy hand? Wealth. Consecrate it now to God. What is in thy mouth? A tongue of eloquence. Use it for God. The tongue is the mightiest instrument that God ever made. What is in thy hand? A kindly grasp. Give that hand to some sad soul. Let us consecrate everything to him! The office, the plough, the pen, the needle, the tongue, the hands, the feet, and the heart for Jesus' sake! No matter how weak are our weapons if God strengthens our arm. The ox-goad with God's help is mightier than Goliath's sword wielded by an arm of flesh. God often chooses weak things to confound the mighty. God designs that the excellency of his power may reveal itself in the weakness of our instruments. Oh! church of the living God, arise in thy might; put on thy strength; consecrate old tools to new uses. Develop thy latent power; destroy thy foolish conservatism. Use anything; use everything, for God. The pulpit and the pew, the charms of women and the winsomeness of children, the glory of music and the power of eloquence, new methods and old truths to honor God and to bless men, these are to be consecrated to-day. I summon the Shamgars with their ox-goats to-day. We defy, and we shall destroy our Philistine foes. We shall heroically do our part, and then pray God to send his Deborahs and Baraks to complete the deliverance, to sing the song of triumph while we all give the glory unto God's Israel and to Israel's God.

THE HELMSMAN.*

A FAR and afloat on life's treacherous sea
In its buoyant jangada, my spirit sails free,
Though tempests rage round me and billows o'erwhelm,
I mount and I conquer; my Lord's at the helm.

Swept down from the sunlight, engulfed in black night,
I call on my helmsman in agonized fright,
He standeth beside me, his soothing reply
Is balm to my spirit: "Fear not, it is I."

So, whether in darkness when heavy gales blow,
And o'er my jangada the huge billows flow,
Or whether in sunlight, on seas blue and fair,
What matter, my soul, if my Helmsman be there?

Though its bosom be surging, far down in the deep
The ocean lies calm as an infant asleep, Come storm, then, and cyclone, let loose the wild sea:
"There is peace, perfect peace, for the soul stayed on thee."

LIGHT IN DARKNESS.

LAMB of God, dark shadows fall Thickly o'er my way,
Is it, Lord, the gathering gloom
That precedes the day?
Tell me, Jesus, can it be,
I shall shortly rest with thee?

Satan fain would tell me, Lord,
That my God is dead.
While his poisoned arrows fly
Thickly round my head,
And I only miss each blow
At thy footstool lying low.

Blessed Jesus, hold my hand,
I am very weak;
And the light of thy dear face
Only would I seek;
Let it shine, O, let it shine!
Lighting this dark sight of mine!

Blessed Jesus, thou dost know
How my heart beats high,
When my soul, with love aglow,
Tells me thou art nigh.
Then I sing amid the gloom,
Waiting for the promised noon.

When, the shadow left behind,
In light shall stand;
And behold my "Sun and Shield," Crowned at God's right hand.
Then through ages I will sing
Of the beauty of my King.

JUDGMENT OF SERVICE.

Christians at the Judgment-Seat of Christ on Trial as to their Work.

BY REV. JOHN AVERILL.

WHAT is the character and object of the judgment awaiting believers which is mentioned in II. Cor. 5: 9, 10? This is a question which has often troubled some of the children of God. So little is it understood, that many suppose they will have to be judged as to the salvation of their souls, that they cannot know whether they are saved until they die, and that the issue may remain doubtful until the final judgment.

Do the Scriptures leave the question thus? Do they leave it to that judgment to determine man's final destiny? Is not this "the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son? He that hath the Son hath life." Can this word change or fail?

The Scriptures teach that believers will "stand before the judgment-seat of Christ," but that not one will appear there as a criminal to be tried; that all the judgment upon sin has, for every believer, been visited upon Christ. So completely has sin been judged in the person of our Substitute, that "no condemnation" is left for those who are in him: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my Word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and cometh not into judgment."

The judgment will be the judgment of service. He will judge our walk as his children, and we shall have reward or loss according to the measure of our faithfulness. "The Master of the house" will reckon with his servants, not to determine whether they shall be saved—this question is unalterably decided now by his own Word for every believer—but to give to each according to the measure of his obedience since he was received into his family.

Rules for discipline and service are given to us in his Word; we cannot neglect and break these with impunity: "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done." Some will be "ashamed before him at his coming;" ashamed of their negligence and disobedience as his servants. To faithful servants it is said, "Your reward shall be great in heaven;" to others, "Ye have no reward of your Father;" some will have the "full reward;" others "suffer loss," their "work shall be burned." Some obtain the crown of faithfulness, others fall short of it. "My reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." The special blessing and highest honor await the "faithful and wise servant."

"That every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done," etc. "Receive"—this is the technical word for receiving wages. In no sense and in no measure can we receive salvation as something due to us: it is of grace, not of debt; but the good and the bad, the well and ill-doing of each servant, he will judge in that day. No real believer can be lost: but if unfaithful—and according to the measure of his unfaithfulness—he may sustain tremendous loss, "he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire," but his work is lost. If as a believer he has been faithful—has been obedient to those instructions, a summary of which is given in II. Peter 1, then "an entrance shall be ministered unto him abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Christ."

St. Paul tells us in this passage how he and his fellow-believers in the Lord Jesus Christ were preparing for this judgment. "Wherefore we labor." What, labor to be saved? Surely not; such must be labor in vain. "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy hath he saved us." "We labor," i.e., as saved persons, "that whether present or absent," i.e., whether we are in or out of the body, whether with the sleeping or the living saints at his appearing, our walk and service may meet with his approval. To such laborers he will say, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

There will be servants whom he cannot thus address. He will not call us faithful if we have not been so.

We must be faithful unto his truth, "holding fast the faithful word"—keeping "the word of his patience;" faithful in service to his body, remembering that not even a cup of water given to a disciple because he belongs to him, can lose a reward; and faithful as his witnesses before the world, in our walk and testimony "holding forth the Word of life."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Jos. M. Baker, Dwight, Ill. 1. When did Thomas Paine, the infidel, die? 2. Give the circumstances of his burial.

1. He died in New York, June 8, 1809. 2. He was refused burial by the Quakers, and was interred in a field on his own estate near New Rochelle. Several years later, Cobbett took the remains to England.

Mrs. G. W. Greenwich, N. Y. I would like to ask through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, how those destitute families get fuel to do their cooking with?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund, besides supplying plain food, gives coal, wood, and oil to such destitute families as need these articles. The coal is furnished either in twenty-five pound lots, in bushels, or in quarter tons. Many poor families in tenements have no accommodations for storing more than a basket or a bushel at a time.

J. B. Hardgrave, Balton, Miss. Where was Noah's ark built? How far was it built from Mount Ararat? Has the extreme top of Mount Ararat ever been ascended? Where could I get a full history of Mount Ararat? Did Dr. Talmage publish a book giving his travels in the East?

The ark was built on the plains of Mesopotamia. The distance from the place of its building to Ararat cannot be definitely stated. A number of travelers have ascended Ararat at different times. A comprehensive description of the mountain range is to be found in McClintock & Strong's "Biblical Encyclopedia." Dr. Talmage published a series of sermons on his travels in the East.

Amos Brown, Amsterdam. Is it right for Christian people to read popular novels? What in your opinion is the effect of novel-reading on spiritual growth?

Novel-reading is a mental dissipation which with too frequent indulgence unites the mind for more substantial and useful literature. The "popular novel" is rarely free from this objection. There are some authors whose stories, having a historical or geographical basis, may be read with interest and profit, but they can hardly be classified among the producers of "popular novels," which as a whole are to be avoided, especially by those who desire spiritual and mental growth.

Bible Class Teacher, Brooklyn, N. Y. Student, Scranton, Pa.: E. Harwood and others. What scientific work would aid me in teaching the Sunday School Lessons of the International Series? I have charge of a class of intelligent young men who want to know if it is possible to reconcile the book of Genesis with scientific facts.

We doubt if scientific works would give you the help you need. Hugh Miller's "Testimony of the Rocks" might serve your purpose in part. The best work on the subject we have seen, and perhaps the one from which you would most readily derive the special help you need, is the volume on Genesis in the Expositor's Bible. It is by Prof. Marcus Dods, D.D., an eminent scholar and theologian, who has written a plain, lucid treatise in which the difficulties you speak of are fairly stated, examined and solved, so far as it is possible to do so at the present stage of inquiry. The book is published by A. C. Armstrong & Son, 51 East Tenth Street, New York.

Bill Bradley, of South Manchester, Conn., thus poetically pleads the cause of the Food Fund:

Ye rich folk, and poor folk, THE HERALD that read,
As thousands of people are now in great need,
And as many are starving in many a place,
Beseech you, for God's sake, to pity their case.
If not done before, when these lines you have read,
Send a dime, or a dollar, to buy them some bread.
For them I beseech you to feel in your hearts,
And to do some good feeling in some other parts—
In places located away farther down—
In the rent in the breeches and rent in the gown.
In that sensitive part of the man called "the pocket,"
Feel quick for a dime, or a larger deposit.
For when people are empty and whitened with frost,
It is all at all, there's no time to be lost.
Are you so fond of pelf that you will not give aught
To the destitute poor, who, at present, have naught?
Shall you leave them to perish of hunger and cold,
While you of your cash keep tenacious hold?
Shall creatures of God, in his own image made,
Die for lack of the food that you might have conveyed?
May the sick and the poor, the high and the low Reply with a savor's vociferous, "No!"
With rich HERALD readers I now have got through,
But poor readers, in closing a word more with you,
I may be with you, as with this man of rhymes,
That, while you have neither got dollars or dimes,
You may not be able to forward a mickle,
But there's no one so poor that he can't send a nickel.

THE LOST BIRTHRIGHT.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Mar. 4, Rom. 8: 12-17; 31-39.

MODERN science has brought new light into our conceptions of ourselves. In teaching us how near akin we are to the beasts in substance and construction, it has taught us how sublime is the distinction which separates us from them. It shows us how the two natures exist within us, one of the earth, earthy, the tendency of which is to sink back into mere animalism; and the other, heavenly, reaching higher and ever higher toward God. The possession of this celestial nature is our birthright, and every man holds it as a sacred trust. In the words of the Apostle, we are debtors, but not to the flesh; we have received the spirit of adoption, and it is to that we are debtors. But the very possession of that spirit involves responsibility. It raises man to a position in which he cannot be treated as an automaton. He is treated as an intelligent creature who has the sense to improve the trust, to let it lie idle or to lose it altogether. Any of these a man may do with the godlike within him. He may choose to give himself to mere physical delights, to live entirely for the body, and may be-

Communion with him, and the power of the Holy Spirit may be had; and with these growth is assured. He who neglects these aids and lives for the gratification of his senses sells his birthright and in the end is poor indeed.

THREE B. Y. P. U. LEADERS.

Among those who have taken part in the movement which has developed into the Baptist Young People's Union, the three leaders whose portraits appear on this page deserve and occupy a prominent place. Miss Alice Boomer is the President of the Union of the State of Kansas. The Union is very strong in that State, there being not less than ten thousand young people of Baptist membership there, among whom the B. Y. P. U. has become a valued means of usefulness. At the recent State Convention at Wichita, when the election of a President was called for, a general wish was expressed that Miss Boomer, one of the Professors in the Hiawatha Academy, should accept the office. The result has justified the choice.

Under Miss Boomer's leadership the Union has made rapid progress, and is growing in numbers and efficiency. Mr. Charles A. Edsall is the President of the Pennsylvania Union. He is an Englishman by birth, but has been twenty-two years on this side of the Atlantic. He now resides at come a glutton or a drunkard, or a libertine, ignoring entirely his celestial birthright he becomes degraded and debased and descends in the scale of creation to the level of the brute. Or he may esteem his birthright so highly that he will choose to live for that supremely. Ignoring the appeals of his physical nature, he may seek to develop the spiritual within him and to grow on that side. The issue is put plainly before him with all its consequences: "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye through the spirit do mortify the body ye shall live." Observation confirms the statement. Men die in life. Numbers all around us have lost all spiritual life. They have no interest in spiritual thoughts. Speak to them of intellectual triumphs, of the nobility of self-sacrifice, of some beautiful example of self-denial and they do not understand it, they are not moved, there is no response. That side of their nature is dead as the affected side of a paralytic. But speak to them of dollars, of a chance to make wealth, or of pleasure and the response is quick and they are on the alert. The man is dead, the brute is alive. He has sold his birthright for something which appeases his appetites. But it must not be forgotten that the growth of the spiritual side of human nature can come only through effort. Make no effort and the animal becomes supreme. As in a garden, culture costs work but to make it a wilderness nothing is necessary but neglect. So God has placed within our reach divine aid.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Testimony is given by many pastors to the valuable help the Epworth League renders in preparing for and conducting revival services.

Extensive preparations are being made at Saginaw, Mich., for the entertainment of the annual Convention of the Epworth Leagues of the State which will take place March 27-29.

President Chapman of the B. Y. P. U., has received a warm welcome at Victoria, B. C. There was a large attendance at his meetings and general enthusiasm was manifested. Mr. Chapman's journey is a continuous ovation.

Five of the seven Christian Endeavor Societies connected with Grace Baptist Church of Philadelphia, the two Junior societies being excepted, are carrying on a mission in that city. Each of the sections takes charge in turn for a week, furnishing the preacher and the prayer-meeting leader, and caring for all the work.

A subscriber at Butte, Mont., writes us that there is a fine opening in that city for a Young Men's Christian Association. There is abundance of material, but no one to organize it and get the movement started. There is also urgent need for such an institution as places of temptation for young men whose evenings are unoccupied are multiplying.

At an enthusiastic meeting of Christian Endeavorers at Bristol, England, recently a Union was formed for Bristol and the District. Over two thousand members of the Societies were present. It was stated at the meeting that the number of British Societies had reached to 1,004 at the end of last year, and since that time the number organized had averaged three a day.

The executive committee of Young Men's Christian Associations in New York State, has issued a prospectus giving, in brief, a review of the work of the past year. It shows that their are 40,000 young men banded together in 150 associations; 9,000 of this number are in 27 railroad associations; 1,400 in college associations; 500 in 4 non-English associations; 4,500 boys in 58 boys' branches.

The Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association, which recently celebrated its fortieth anniversary, is now at work at seven points, covered by the Central association, Eastern District, Bedford, Prospect Park, Twenty-sixth Ward, German and Long Island College branches. Five localities and two special classes of men are represented in its work.

The Young Men's Christian Association at Newburgh, N. Y., under the leadership of H. J. Wilkins, is holding Sunday afternoon men's meetings in the opera house, with excellent success. On Sunday, January 21, 550 men were present. W. M. Fenno, of the Wagner Sleeping Car Co., Grand Central Depot, New York, made an excellent gospel address, and several arose for prayer.

The Baptist Young People's Union of Pennsylvania is making an aggressive campaign. The Corresponding Secretary has sent to each church the following questions: 1. Have you in your church a Young People's Society? If you have, give its name. 2. If you have not, are you in favor of organizing such a society along the lines and with the purposes of the Baptist Young People's Union? 3. Is your Society connected with other Young People's Societies in other Baptist churches? 4. If it is not, would its members be favorable to such affiliation, and would you promote it?

A Seamen's Home in New York, under the auspices of the Mizpah Circle of King's Daughters, has done great work in moral and spiritual aid to the seamen, which has been most gratefully accepted by them. In this branch of work aid has reached a class of men who are surrounded by bad influences the greater part of their time; but great hopes are entertained that some seeds of kindness may here take root and grow. A Sailors' Library has been started, which provides for boxes of good books for circulation among the various ships, and as the fund grows much good may be accomplished.

An Afternoon Call.

How a Typical High-Class Moslem Lady Entertains—A Pretty Pasha-ess and her Dignified Mother-in-Law.

HAVING due regard to the proprieties it is, perhaps, well that I should not state in which of the larger cities we have visited in Palestine and northern Syria. I availed myself of the invitation through a friend to pay my respects to the wife of a wealthy citizen. In our wanderings we have come upon Boston, New York and Chicago newspapers in such unlikely places that we have grown timid in the use of the names of persons and well-known localities. Some people on this side of the Mediterranean (and on the thither side of the Atlantic) like to be written up. The sight of one's name in print infuses a grateful glow through the moral and mental system, and titillates the self-love which is the one mighty common attribute of humankind from pole to pole. Others shrink honestly from printed publicity, as from the track of red-hot iron, even if the notice be laudatory. Nobody—and this is a rule without exception—enjoys being made ridiculous in the sight of friends or strangers.

In view of these things, the sketch of this one of my visits, if I would report everything as it happened, must go forth undated as to time and place.

We were set down by our coachman at the mouth of a long, rather narrow passage or court, paved with rough stones, and neither light nor clean. In the United States, we should have considered it an unpromising entrance to a factory or warehouse. As the introduction to the abode of one who counts his wealth by millions of dollars, it was simply inexplicable to the mind of the average traveler from the sunset land. As strange seemed the four flights of stone stairs we climbed to reach the drawing-rooms. They were not even marble steps up which we toiled pantingly, but of the yellowish freestone in general use here for the better class of buildings. Staircases borrow new horrors (to those who have left youth and length of wind behind them), from the height of Oriental ceilings. It is not unusual to find these in private residences from twenty to twenty-five feet high, and each staircase conducting to the floor above is double and mercifully broken by a landing. Upon these landings we paused to gather breath and heart, until we beheld at the head of the eighth half-flight, a maid in jacket and short skirt, a veil pinned over her black hair, awaiting us. Taking the right hand of each of us in turn, with both of hers, and courtesying so deeply that one knee must have touched the floor, she raised the back of the hand, first, to her lips, then to her forehead, lastly to her heart, and stepping back as she arose, motioned us to precede her into an open door. A few steps within the threshold of a spacious drawing-room, we were met by the mistress of the house. She is a Circassian, married to a Turkish gentleman, and still bears traces of unusual beauty in her clearly-moulded features, dark eyes and sweet smile. Her attire was a disappointment. I had expected oriental magnificence and found Parisian simplicity in a pale-pink gown, trimmed modestly with native lace. Except that her wrists were loaded with bracelets and that the brooch at her throat was a superb emerald, the largest I ever saw, surrounded by diamonds, I should have sought vainly for tokens of her nationality and her husband's wealth. She greeted us cordially, shaking hands as an Englishwoman might, and led us through the outermost and largest room of the suite to a smaller where she waved us to arm-chairs. Two little girls, eight and ten years of age, were their mother's aides in making us welcome. Each bent her pretty head to kiss our hands, and each, unbidden unless by the mother's eye, hastened to fetch stools for our feet before withdrawing into the background.

I could speak no Arabic; our hostess neither English nor French. We carried on a sort of three-cornered conversation that would have been dull enough to a listener, the trite nothings of polite society losing what little flavor they might have had at first hand (or mouth) in filtering from English into Arabic and back from Arabic to me in English.

My initial observation that the afternoon had become suddenly warm was made in French under the impression that the handsome Circassian understood that tongue, and at her inquiring look, had to be "done" into English that the interpreter might get hold of it. It was irresistibly funny, but we three kept straight faces and proceeded to pelt one another with cut-and-dried figures of speech, the little daughters regarding us with wide grave eyes, and a maid, a straight dark-eyed woman, a striking figure, standing in the arched doorway of the third drawing-room, never removed her gaze from the hands of her mistress. She had slipped off her sandals upon entering the parlor, and stood now in her white-stockinged feet upon the carpet.

This carpet was another and a sharp disappointment. It was costly in material, but for pattern, might have been selected by a rich vulgarian in Cincinnati or Denver. With the vision before me of certain Persian and Turkish rugs I had seen that day in a city bazaar, the soft harmony of whose colors were a dream of artistic perfection, I resented the glaring flowers ramping over about four hundred yards of white ground. Chairs and sofas from a Parisian upholsterer were pushed stiffly against the walls; satin curtains from the same establishment hung at the dozen windows. The bare walls were the only evidence of Moslem occupation of the vast rooms.

I was beginning to weary of tasteless splendor that had in it hardly a touch of the Oriental element, when another maid, putting her sandals at the entrance, ushered in two more visitors. They were introduced to us in due form as the wife and mother of the highest Turkish official in the city, and were evidently personages of importance. It presently transpired that they were to remain to dinner. That meal would be served at six o'clock, and it was now a little after four. Three maids removed the new visitors' hoods and wraps, and the wife of the Pasha accepted an arm-chair. Not so with her mother-in-law. Parisian innovations might catch the fancy of the younger generation, and turn aside the very elect from time-honored customs. She would none of them. A couple of maids hastened under the mistress's direction to heap in one corner four red satin cushions, and, when the old woman had crossed her legs upon them, to place other cushions at her back. Thus established, she sighed satisfiedly and smiled around the room. She supplied the "Oriental element" for which I had longed!

Answering the smile and nod bestowed upon me when she learned that I had made a three weeks' journey to see her, I took a mental photograph of her as Moslem and as mother-in-law. The East is the paradise of mothers-in-law, as I shall further demonstrate some day, and this particular specimen of a well-abused class magnified her office. It was plain that she considered herself the most important personage in the room. Her daughter-in-law was languid and looked sickly. Her sallow complexion showed to disadvantage against a Parisian gown of tan-colored stuff, with a vest of creamy silk; her heavy bracelets hung upon her lean wrists like handcuffs; her head was bare, and her hair negligently arranged. After her mother-in-law had interrupted her several times in the middle of a remark indolently uttered in the Turkish dialect, she became silent, leaned back in her arm-chair and lighted a cigarette. A silver stand of cigarettes and matches was brought in just before her arrival.

The "Oriental element" was clad in yellow silk trousers, white silk stockings and yellow slippers, as her attitude allowed us ample opportunities for observing. Above these was a long shapeless sacque of fawn-colored silk, quilted in perpendicular rows. If she had selected color and pattern with an eye to heightening her native homeliness, her success was perfect. The sacque was large in the neck and revealed the dingy wrinkles of the throat. A big diamond on one hand a ruby upon the other, called attention to the thick, yellowish fingers, when she clasped her hands below one knee and swayed gently back and forth. Her head was bound about with a white turban, or loose cap, below which escaped stray gray locks; she had but three teeth, and her lower lip hung loosely. I could compare her to nothing but the hag of childish nightmares and the wicked fairy of folk-lore. Yet she laughed benevolently when the pretty little girls approached her and bowed to kiss her venous hand, and patted them on the head, muttering what sounded like an incantation, and was probably a blessing.

Small gilded tables were now brought in, and upon them were set in array a Sevres tea-service, and silver baskets of biscuits and cakes. The hostess poured out the tea, through a silver tea-strainer—precisely as an American woman serves it on her "At Home" afternoon; the maids passed the refreshments to the guests. The "Oriental element" refused the foreign beverage with an imperious wave of the hand, and looked on rebukingly.

But the oddest performance was still store for my unaccustomed eyes. As the bell in a neighboring tower struck five, the old lady scrambled to her feet like a cat, and without uttering a word, waddled into the third room of the suite. The black-eyed maid who stood, statue-like, in the doorway, followed her, and the hostess, with no sign of surprise, excused herself to us with a slight bend of the head, and went, as we supposed, to see what it all meant. In my Western ignorance, I supposed that the "Oriental element" meditated a nap upon the luxurious divan visible through the wide arch, and when the maid dragged out a rug from beneath the cushioned lounge, was puzzled by seeing her lay it in the exact middle of the apartment. The hostess now produced from the drawer of a cabinet a long white scarf of some thin tissue, and offered it to the "Oriental element." Stepping upon the oblong bit of carpeting which I now saw was what buyers of eastern stuffs know as "a prayer-rug," the crone wrapped the scarf over her head and across her forehead and chin, after the manner of a veil, and folding her hands, first upon her chest, then upon her forehead, raised them and her eyes toward the ceiling.

The maid resumed her station in the doorway, her dark face as immobile as the Egyptian Sphinx, her eyes again directed to the hands of her mistress, who came back to us, saying tranquilly in Arabic:

"Madame wishes to pray!"

I bent my head involuntarily, feeling and courtesy dictating some token of respect to an act of devotion, but the daughter-in-law took a fresh cigarette and a handful of sweets from a basket near by, and with the air of one temporarily relieved from an irksome presence, began a lively chat with the lady of the house, into which my friend and interpreter was speedily drawn. While the talk proceeded, I watched furtively, but closely, the proceedings in the adjoining room. It was one of the three times a day at which the devout Moslem must pray with his face toward Mecca. I have been informed since that it is unusual to see a woman Moslem at her devotions, although the faithful of the other sex drop spade, trowel, paint-brush, chisel, awl, plough, even knife and fork, at the appointed season and prostrate themselves as commanded by the Koran. But this particular specimen of the "Oriental element," obviously differing from St. Paul as to the profitableness of bodily exercise, went through the various stages of her orisons with a swing and energy worthy of the most stalwart follower of the Prophet. She bowed seven times toward the holy city, at an angle her apparent infirmity would seem to make impossible; she lifted eyes and clasped hands times without number, and finally went down upon her knees on the prayer-rug, and bumped her head hard upon the spot indicated by the pattern as the proper and edifying point where the faithful forehead should strike. She was still in this attitude, her covered head rising and falling with the regularity of an automatic toy, when we took our leave. The performance, so extraordinary to us, was of no moment whatever to her fellow-religionists. Their gossip went on more smoothly for her absence; their voices were not lowered by so much as a semi-tone. Unless deafened by religious ecstasy, she must have heard every word. The hostess offered no excuse or explanation. Attending us to the outer door of the drawing-room, she thanked us for the honor we had done her by calling, and hoped that we would repeat our visit, then went back to the Pasha-ess, who was helping herself to a third cigarette. The little daughters kissed our hands, and raised them to their foreheads, the three maids courtesied low to us from their several stations; our last glimpse of the "Oriental element" showed her still prostrate, and still smiting the prescribed spot of the prayer-rug with her forehead. The fair Circassian is her husband's only wife, and they have, as we have seen, advanced ideas upon the subject of house-keeping and the entertainment of visitors. Their daughters have a governess—a Parisian—and the sons a tutor. But with the exception of her husband, not a man enters her presence. There was a queer sensation in sitting in social converse with three women whose lives were so rigorously divided from what, in our own land, brings variety and spirit into homes and society, the frank and gracious association of the sexes.

Woman may be said to supply the sugar-and-water at such entertainments, and some people, notably the French, enjoy, "eau sucrée." The American palate—and constitution—give the preference to lemonade.

MARION HARLAND.

DISCOVERING here that she was drifting into her vernacular, and standing always in awe of her mistress's dignified kinsman, Elspeth lapsed into silence.

Mr. Lanier raised his eyes abruptly from a seemingly minute scrutiny of his patent-leather boots.

"You have been with Mrs. Paull a long time, Elspeth?" he said, mildly, although his face was not softened.

"Sin' five years before she was married, sir."

"You are so well acquainted with our family affairs, it is but just I should take you into full confidence now—" two odd white dents deepening about the nostrils as he talked. "In my judgment, it would be better if the two elder children, at least, were given plainly to understand that Mr. Paull is no longer to be considered their father, or their mother's husband. In all human probability he will never return to America. Not to disguise an ugly truth, he is passing off another woman as his wife and traveling-companion. I beg your pardon for speaking so plainly!" for the upright Scotchwoman uttered a low horrified cry—"But it had to be said. Their mother will not consent that the children shall hear the facts in the case. She thinks that they will gradually forget one whom they never see, and whose name is seldom mentioned. I have paid to his employers the money he stole, and have seen to it that the wretched story did not find its way into the newspapers. I stand prepared to keep my sister above the chance of want, and to help educate her children. All this I have written to Ernest Paull. He is, I have discovered through agents I have on the other side of the Atlantic, living in Nice, France, under the name of "Mr. Paul Morgan," and that he and his companions are already known in that town as gambling adventurers. I have, furthermore, notified him that if he ever shows his face in this country again, I will give him up to the law. As I shall—were he doubly my brother-in-law. He has destroyed my sister's happiness. He shall not hang upon her life like a foul growth that would draw all the strength and sweetness out of it!"

"Does she know—what you have told me, sir?"

The question was whispered; the rugged features were wrung out of their grim impassiveness by the revolting revelation.

"She does! I had to break the news to her in the first place, and three days ago, she sent the nurse out of the room and would know what I had heard since she was struck down by that blow. I had to tell her."

"The wonder is that she isn't dead outright, sir; her that fairly worshipped the very print of his feet in the dust."

She raised a corner of her apron to her eyes.

"If she had not sprung from genuine Lanier stock—if she were one degree less spirited, she would have died," said the brother. "As to Miss Marie—she is an especial pet of yours, I am aware, Elspeth, but she is her father's daughter, within and without. All this rubbish about making a patron saint of a man who is not worthy to black her mother's shoes—this keeping flowers under his portrait, and praying to it!"

"Na! na! Mr. Lanier! I dinna say that, on'y that she was minded to kneel down before it when she prayed."

In the depth of her honest distress, she could not have her nursing misrepresented.

Mr. Lanier smiled indulgent amusement. "It amounts to about the same thing. Marie would be a nice girl but for her likeness in character and face to her father. She may come to something better, now that she will be left entirely to her mother's management. But she is a Paull and must be watched carefully. I shall urge my sister to-day to tell her everything, young as she is, but I have little hope of succeeding in making her mother see that she owes it to herself to do this. It will be just like the silly little sentimentalist that Marie is to nurse her fancied sorrows, and go on idolizing the rascal who would, by now, be lodged behind prison bars if he had not happened to marry Alice Lanier eighteen years ago—more's the pity!—it would be just like Marie, I say, to add to her mother's trials by disrespectful behavior, and cruel questions, even if she does not defy her authority altogether."

"She'll not do that, sir. She's been too well reared, and she has too good a heart."

He almost laughed now at the anxious deprecation in word and accent.

"I am willing to hope so, if only because she is your favorite, my sister's eldest daughter, and my mother's namesake. All depends upon our success in getting the Paull out of her nature, and the Lanier in. I shall, as I remarked, try to change her mother's mind with respect to the wisdom of telling Lanier and Marie the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Is she ready to see me, now?"

When their footsteps sounded upon the floor of the upper hall, the folds of the half-drawn portiere hanging in the doorway between the parlor and dining-room moved, and Marie stepped into sight.

She was studying in the front parlor, when Elspeth answered the door-bell the young girl had not heard. At the sound of her uncle's voice, she ran behind the curtain, supposing that he would, as was his custom, go directly upstairs. Disappointed in this expectation, she saw no impropriety in remaining in her hiding-place while the talk ran upon her mother's health. He would, undoubtedly, go to see his sister as soon as he had satisfied himself on this point. He had not taken a seat, and the interview would be brief and unimportant. When Elspeth introduced her own (Marie's) name, and entered upon her description of the portrait-scene, anger and shame paralyzed the eavesdropper. Each instant made it more difficult to discover herself; presently she ceased to think of doing it.

They were conspirators, plotting against her happiness; slanderers of him whom she revered and loved beyond all other created things. Self-preservation, and, yet more, jealousy for her father's honor and fair fame, incited her to get all the information she could collect, by any means, of their dastardly scheme. In asserting that she was Ernest Paull's own child in character as in features, her uncle had not specified among the traits they held in common a vanity so sensitive that the mother had often been sick at heart in recognizing the offshoot of a stock too deeply-rooted in the father ever to be killed out. Mr. Lanier's criticisms of herself, so much more disdainful than if he had revealed her faults to her mother, or spoken to herself of them, stung her like spatters of boiling oil. She would have flouted hotly the insinuation that a large proportion of the resentment that carried her beyond the bounds of reason and natural affection for the mother who bore her, was not so much generous indignation over her father's wrongs as the smart of sacrificed self-esteem.

She had never been fond of her Uncle Roger, reflecting, while yet a child, her father's sentiments toward his upright and stately brother-in-law. As she gained in age and intelligence, her father and she exchanged views as to her mother's best-beloved relative, and she sympathized warmly with his wounded pride—he named it "feeling"—when the terms of her grandfather's were known. Ernest Paull was always consciously or mechanically, posing for effect in one character or another. As an affectionate husband, ready and glad to expend his worldly substance for his family, he doubtless sometimes imposed upon himself. Marie's belief in him was absolute. Roger Lanier was sorely tried that day, and spoke with more warmth than was habitual with him, even under strong provocation. Judgment and language would have been more charitable had he been given more time in which to digest the information sprung upon him by the serving woman. As it was, he carried a more temperate spirit into his sister's presence. Before the stairhead was reached he would, if appealed to, have modified the sentence hastily pronounced upon a young, passionate creature whose chief fault in his eyes was the resemblance for which she was not responsible, to the man he abhorred.

She stood, trembling like an aspen, her palms pressed hard upon her temples, her eyes wild, her face livid from the storm that raged in her soul.

"I don't believe it! It is a lie, an abominable, wicked, wicked lie!" she hissed through locked teeth.

Then, hearing Mrs. Williams coming up the kitchen-stairs, she dashed up to her room, bolted the door, and flung herself, face downward, upon the floor, clutching fiercely at the carpet until the nails fastened themselves in the threads.

"Papa, papa, my wronged, insulted, persecuted darling!" she moaned. "Oh! I could kill them! I could kill them!"

At three o'clock that Saturday afternoon she entered the post-office, a mile and more from her home, and asked for "a French stamp."

"I beg pardon, Miss!" said the clerk.

"I want to send a letter to Nice in France," she answered, coloring as she felt that another customer standing beside her, turned toward her at the words.

"Ah!" Without explanation of her blunder, the servant employed by his Master, the Public, to discharge his nominal duties with the slightest possible outlay of language and courtesy—passed over a five cent stamp.

"Do you think that will take my letter all right?" faltered the novice doubtfully.

"Take it anywhere on the globe."

She affixed it, without further remark, laying the envelope on the counter to do it, the address in bold, black characters, uppermost, and dropped it into the slit over the letter-basket.

She was overtaken at the outer door, by a bright-faced, dark-eyed personage, whose apparel and speech bespoke the lady.

"I beg you to excuse the seeming impertinence, but am I mistaken in supposing you to be Miss Paull?"

"That is my name," civilly curt.

Just now she was disposed to aggressiveness, with or without provocation.

"Your voice is so like your mother's that it startled me, but you have your father's face," resumed the stranger. "Your mother was my school-mate and dear friend. I am Mrs. Barnes. I heard yesterday, for the first time, and then through apparent accident, that she is living in Brooklyn, quite near us, and that she is ill. I could not resist the temptation to follow you when I heard you speak, just now, and caught a glimpse of your face. Will you tell me exactly how she is to-day, and if there is any way in which I can be of service to her?"

CHAPTER IX.

"For patience,—when the rough winds blow.

For patience,—when our hopes are fading.

When visible things all backward go,

And nowhere seems the power of aiding.

God still enfolds thee with his viewless hand

And leads thee surely to the fatherland."

—From the German.

He who knows the Pequod, New Jersey, of to-day has but an imperfect idea of what Pequod township was at the date of which I am writing.

Beautiful for situation it must ever have been, since the hills settled upon their foundations, and the waters found their level at the foot of the range of hills. Right in the centre of the valley lies a lakelet, three miles in length, and less than one mile in breadth at the widest part. The shores are notched boldly by headlands, and curved gracefully by meadows, and grooved at intervals by reedy creeks, and brown, brisk brooks racing down from the mountains to see for themselves what the greater open world is like. Back of the lake, and on all sides of it, are the hills,—mountains, the New Jersey folk call them—proving the correctness of the nomenclature by reference to the map of the United States whereupon they figure as faintly-outlined spurs of the far-stretching Blue Ridge, which forms the ribs upon the right side of our Continent. With over-lapping declivities these eminences encircled Pequod Lake, an Old Guard of honor.

They are friendly mountains, and socially-minded toward the valley they environ; in benignant swells and dips they lie against the sky, looming through mists, and sinking to sleep under the stars. At the date of this humble chronicle, they were the boundary of this sparse settlement bearing the same name as the lake and township.

There were not more than fifteen dwellings within sight of a young girl who sat one June forenoon upon the steps of a church set well towards the base of the tallest wall of the amphitheatre of hills. The building antedated the Revolutionary War, and, although modern vandalism under the disguise of improvement, had done its best—or worst—to spoil it by daubing with white paint bricks reddrown with age, it was still a creditable specimen of Colonial architecture. It stood about twenty yards away from the highway—"street" by courtesy, and by virtue of definite, if unpaved sidewalks. Behind the church was the burying-ground, better kept than the majority of rural cemeteries, and across the side-street to the left the "Academy," alias the district school-house, the junior by fifty years of the sanctuary. The broad thoroughfare was lined with spreading elms, and, sweeping by the church and the white parsonage nestled confidingly under the venerable eaves, divided the church property from the grandest house in the township,—erected by a retired city merchant,—crossed a bridge and rolled along a hundred-yard level; ran over a second bridge built above one of the racing brooks aforesaid, then—past another homestead inferior in size, and superior in age to the former, and, swerving slightly to the left, had an easy time of it until it gained a third bridge which carried it into "the village," situated nearly a measured mile from the church. A woollen mill made the village, and the same corporation ran "the store" and post-office.

The girl who had let herself down wearily in the shade cast by the elms upon the broad, low step of the church, was Marie Paull. As she took off her straw hat and fanned herself with it, one could see that she was sligher in figure and more ethereal of visage than she had been six months before. The lines of cheek and chin were fine to delicacy, the blue eyes were larger and deeper, the corners of the mouth had a dispirited droop. Sanguine observers foretold that she would pick up flesh when she stopped growing. She had "run up like a mullein-stalk or a hop-vine. By-and-by, she would get all her perpendicular inches, and go to work to make bone and flesh."

Pessimistic well-wishers asked solicitously if there were consumption in any branch of the family, and "only hoped that she might weather the next three years. So many girls went out, like the wick of an empty lamp, between seventeen and twenty-one."

The change in her appearance, and her failure in vigor and appetite, together with the hacking cough that wore upon Mrs. Paull's vital forces after she was convalescent from fever, were the alleged causes of the removal of the family to the country in April. Roger Lanier, had come into possession, in the way of an exchange of property, of an old-fashioned farmstead in a retired neighborhood of Northern New Jersey. He offered it to his sister, rent-free, for as long a time as she chose to occupy it, having, as he said, no use for it himself, and preferring to put a good care-taker into it to troubling himself with a farmer-tenant. The location was healthy; it was, by stage and railway, within two hours of New York City; for some years to come the three younger children would be better off in the country.

Mrs. Paull was not hood-winked by the dry, business-like details of the scheme as propounded by her brother. She was too familiar with his style of conferring benefits to embarrass him by voluble gratitude, but when he had gone, she secluded herself in her chamber for an hour before she could trust countenance or voice to make known the purport of Roger's visit to Marie.

She would consult the child, first of all, in the momentous matter of a change of home. It was a golden opportunity for breaking down the thickening wall of reserve of which she had become conscious by the time she left her bed and endeavored to take her old place in the household. Indeed, the change in the once merry, affectionate daughter whose graceful development she had watched with maternal pride, was the means of awakening her from the strange numbness of brain and heart considered by physician and nurse the gravest symptom of her malady.

Across the Dark Continent.

How Dr. James Johnston Found "The Christian Herald" in Africa—His Opinion of the Duties of Churches and Missionaries—Khama and Lewanika.

A singular coincidence in connection with his journal was described by Dr. James Johnston, the African explorer, on a visit he recently paid to this office. He said that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would always be associated in his mind with a very pleasant surprise he had during his long African journey. After his weary tramp from the West Coast east and south, he reached Mashonaland, weary and discouraged, and terribly sick with the African fever. It was seven months since he had received news from home, or had seen any newspaper, and a long time since he had looked on a white face. As he lay there, tossing in fever, the longing for some news of civilization grew intolerable. Calling one of his boys to his side he told him to scour the country in had a special interest for him above all others. Nothing could have cheered and encouraged him so much and that at a time when he was so sorely in need of such help. In reply to a question as to the justice of the criticism called forth by his book on "Romance versus Reality in South Central Africa," which was exhaustively reviewed in this journal on Dec. 6, 1893, Dr. Johnston said that there could be no greater mistake made than to infer from his book that he is an opponent of missionary work in the Dark Continent. He is distinctly and emphatically in favor of missionary effort; and his journey confirmed the belief, with which he set out, that the duty of the Christian Church to prosecute it is imperative. His sole aim and object in writing as he has done was to put before the people a true, accurate and unvarnished description of the field and to state the conditions and describe the methods by which alone, in his opinion, could the work be carried on successfully. He thought it was better for the Church and the missionary and for the consecrated testify that, if slowly, yet surely the power for good of a mission such as this, conducted on plain practical common sense as well as Christian principles, must in due course become manifest both in lives and homes of the people among whom it is established." King Khama, who helped the British in their conflict with the Matabele, was ill with fever when Dr. Johnston was in his country. Khama is a Christian and a strong temperance man. His rule is absolute and he exercises it to enforce Prohibition. Not only does he drive off his territory any trader who introduces intoxicating liquor, but banishes any native who is caught making native beer. His own brother-in-law was one of the offenders thus punished. Khama, however, does not always exert his authority to so good a purpose. Dr. Johnston found domestic slavery a recognized institution in the land and Khama, of course, the principal slaveholder. There was much immorality also in the country and Khama opposed reforms in social customs which might restrict it. Of Lewanika, the King of the Marotsi, who according to the cable dispatches is now strenuously endeavoring to prevent Lobengula taking refuge in his country, Dr. Johnston has much to say. He made an extended stay there, as Lewanika had considerable sickness in his land and was glad to have a white physician there. So pressing was his hospitality, that Dr. Johnston found himself practically a prisoner until the epidemic abated. A portrait of his majesty in royal costume appeared in our issue of Dec. 6. Lewanika is an enthusiast in music and he likes to have it wherever he goes. His musicians are required to play during the night while he slumbers to soothe him and keep away the spirits of the men he has put to death. A picture of the royal band with their drums appears on this page. Lewanika is opposed to the entrance of missionaries into his land and has kept a Primitive Methodist missionary with his delicate wife and child encamped in a wagon on the borders of his country for many months, refusing them permission to enter. M. Coillard, a French missionary, who has labored in the country successfully for seven years, was refused permission by Lewanika for a whole year before being allowed to settle.

AN UNFOUNDED REPORT.

President Greene of the Princeton Theological Seminary, has written a denial of the statement that two of the students of the Seminary have sought admission in the Roman Catholic Church. He says there is no truth whatever in the report.

search of some settler who had an English newspaper and to buy it off him for any price he wanted. The boy went away on his errand and was absent a long time. One blazing hot afternoon Dr. Johnston saw him coming back with a paper in the cleft stick in which the African carriers carry letters and papers. He seized it eagerly, while the boy told the story of his search. After many inquiries and many miles of travel he had heard of a man who kept a species of saloon, which also served the purpose of a Post Office, if the office for such postal service as exists in Mashonaland can be dignified by such a title. The man in charge heard the boy's appeal on behalf of the sick traveler and admitted that he had some English papers, but said that they were too rare and precious to be parted with. Looking over them again, he said, "Here is a religious paper in English, I don't suppose we shall have much use for that here. You can take that to your master." Dr. Johnston opened it and saw to his delight that it was a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of which he is a regular reader in his Jamaica home. The familiar heading was sufficient for him for the moment, bringing up in his mind a host of tender recollections and as he looked at it, his eyes were dimmed with tears. But a still greater surprise was in store for him. On the first page was his own portrait and a picture of his beloved home in Jamaica. It was the issue of Feb. 3, 1892, in which we told the story of his work in Jamaica and his setting out for Africa with his negro helpers. He did not know of the story having been published and was therefore all the more astonished. It seemed to him like a special intervention of Providence in his behalf that in his sickness and loneliness, fifteen hundred miles from the coast, right up in the heart of Africa, he should meet with his favorite journal and with that number of it which mer who were intending to become missionaries to know the exact truth. The Church ought to know how dense was the darkness of the African mind, how slow and how difficult is the process of getting the native to comprehend the object of the missionary's coming to Africa and how patient it ought to be in waiting for results of the labors of the men it sends out. The eagerness of missionary societies to receive from the missionaries in Africa news of conversions and of churches being formed, Dr. Johnston believes has led some missionaries to send home statements in which their hopes were expressed rather than the absolute facts and so the church has been unintentionally deceived. The missionary has been so encouraged by the numbers who came to listen to him and to learn to read that he has entertained hopes of conversion which subsequent events have not justified and the men whom he had described in his letters home as on the point of accepting Christ and declaring themselves Christians have grieved and disappointed him by manifesting sordid motives and relapsing into heathenism. As an instance of successful missionary work, Dr. Johnston cites the American Board's station at Celumi which he visited. There he found Revs. Stover, Woodside and Cotton with their wives, and Miss Clark, a Canadian lady, who assists in teaching school. The station has been established twelve years and there are now twenty-four converts in church fellowship. "The marked improvement in the social condition of the natives in the neighborhood, as compared with those met in other parts,

Hood's Sarsaparilla Made Him Feel as Young as a Boy.

"I had a severe attack of pneumonia last December, and it was thought, I should die, but I gradually pulled through, and then did not seem to gain any strength. I had to be helped like an infant, and had fallen away from 145 to 80 lbs. I read about Hood's Sarsaparilla, and I decided to take it.

WHAT BRINGS HAPPINESS.

I have peeped into quiet parlors where the carpet is clean and not old, writes Rev. Dr. John Hall, and the furniture is polished and bright, into rooms where the chairs are neat and the floor carpeted, into kitchens where the family live, and the meals are cooked and eaten, and the boys and girls are as lithe and joyous as the sparrows overhead, and I see that it is not so much wealth, or learning, or clothes, or servants, or toil, or idleness, or town, or country, or station, as it is tone and temper that render homes happy or wretched. And I see, too, that in town or country, good sense and kind feeling, and God's grace make life what no teachers or accomplishments, or means, or society can make it—the opening stage of an everlasting psalm—the fair beginning of an endless and blessed existence—the goodly, modest, well-proportioned vestibule to a temple of God's building that shall never decay, or wax old or vanish away.

A POOR BLIND WOMAN'S GIFT.

At a recent missionary meeting in Paris, a poor blind woman put 27 francs into the plate. "You cannot afford so much," said he. "Yes, sir, I can," she answered. On being pressed to explain, she said: "I am blind; and I said to my fellow straw workers, 'How much money do you spend in the year for oil for your lamps when it is too dark to work nights?' They replied, 'Twenty-seven francs.' 'So,' said the poor woman, 'I found I save so much in the year because I am blind, and do not need a lamp; and I give it to send light to the heathen.'"

HERE IS Something In Flowers, Both new and distinct.

NEW SWEET SCENTED PANSIES.

NEW HYBRIDS, in which are blended the rich all the beauty characteristic of the Pansy.

This new race is the happy result of crossing Pansies and Alpine Violets, and no American garden in 1894 will be complete that does not contain them.

THE FLOWERS OF THE NEW FRAGRANT PANSIES RETAIN THE DELIGHTFUL PERFUME of the violet, combined with form, size and colors of the pansy. In fact, critics consider that the flowers of this new class are even more beautiful than pansies, the colors of the selfs being purer and the blotchings, markings, pencilings, etc., of the variegated sorts being more delicately blended.

THE PLANTS OF THE NEW FRAGRANT PANSIES possess the hardy, tufted or spreading habit of the wild violet and continue to grow and bloom in increasing abundance for years.

PRICE, PER PACKET, OF SEEDS IN MIXED COLORS, 25 CENTS.

A complete description and colored plate of this new floral beauty will be found in our 1894 Catalogue of "EVERYTHING for the GARDEN," which we will send FREE with every order from this advertisement, when this paper is mentioned. If Catalogue alone is wanted, it will be mailed on receipt of 20 cents. As every copy, however, with postage, costs us 25 cents, you will find it more advantageous to order the NEW SWEET SCENTED PANSY and get for nothing a catalogue of 160 pages, containing nearly 500 engravings and six beautiful colored plates—in fact, the most superb publication of its kind ever issued. Postage stamps accepted as cash.

How A GREAT MISSION GREW.

The Brilliant Christian Service Performed in the Celestial Empire by the China Inland Mission and its Founder, Rev. J. Hudson Taylor.

SOME years ago a lady who was visiting some relatives about eighty miles from her home, rose from the dinner-table and excusing herself to the party went to her room, and locking the door, threw herself on her knees in earnest prayer. It was evident that it was no slight request that she was presenting, but something very dear to her heart. She remained there a long time pleading and the shades of night had fallen when she rose, but the shadows had passed from her face and the clear light of faith shone there. She believed that her petition had been granted. She had been praying for the conversion of her beloved son, who had fallen among bad companions and had become practically an infidel. What that meant to this Christian lady and her husband and none but themselves knew. From his birth they had prayed for him, that he might live to love and serve God. The father had been particularly definite in his petitions. A book by Capt. Basil Hall describing the appalling spiritual darkness of China, had fallen into his hands and as he read of the hundreds of millions of people to whom no missionary was preaching the Gospel, his heart ached, and he prayed that his infant boy might be used to carry the good news to that benighted land. This was the boy who at sixteen years of age was enmeshed in the snares of scepticism. It was for this boy that his mother was pleading through that evening. Eighty miles away the boy was in his home. He had an unoccupied evening and looked around the house for something to read. He took up a magazine and his attention was attracted by a story. As he read on he discovered that the story was merely an introduction to a religious appeal. He thought he would finish the story and put the thing aside when he reached the religious application. But he read on; light broke upon his soul and there and then he knelt down and gave himself to Christ. Out of the answer to that mother's prayer, so quickly granted, has grown the great organization now known in every land by its name of "the China Inland Mission," which has now five hundred and sixty missionaries laboring in that dark land, most of whom have gone to districts where the name of Jesus had never been heard until they spoke it. The name of that boy is J. Hudson Taylor, a name that China will never forget and which multitudes love, because the man who bears it, has been the means of extending Christ's kingdom into regions barred by impenetrable prejudice.

Mr. Taylor's conversion was followed by a solemn consecration. Speaking of it long afterwards, he said: "I put myself, my life, my all upon the altar. . . . For what service I was accepted I knew not; but a deep consciousness that I was no longer my own took possession of me. . . . I was not my own to give myself away; for I knew not when or how he whose alone I was, and for whose disposal I felt I must ever keep my-and the minister asked him how he proposed to go.

"I suppose," said the lad, "I shall go as the twelve and seventy went in Judaea, without purse or scrip, relying for my needs on him who calls me to the work." This was in 1847 and he was then fifteen years old. The minister told him that he would grow wiser as he grew older. "I have grown older," Mr. Taylor said recently, "but I am not wiser. I have made God my sole reliance these many years."

He had chosen medicine as his profession prior to his conversion, and realizing how helpful that knowledge would be in his work as a missionary, he continued his studies, availing himself of every opportunity for Christian work. It was Evangelization Society willingly accepted the young volunteer, and under its auspices he commenced his labors in China, on March 1, 1854.

His early experiences were most discouraging. His life was frequently in danger and unexpected difficulties were encountered through the disturbed condition of the country. But what oppressed his mind most was the terrible fact that the proportion of missionaries to the population was only one missionary to three million Chinese. He toiled on working hard and faithfully. He needed no stimulant, but one came to him in a startling question from a Chinese convert, who was brought to Christ from Buddhism under Mr. Taylor's preaching.

After describing how he and his father had diligently sought the true light in Confucianism, Taoism and Buddhism, the convert expressed his joy in finding it in Christ and was profuse in his gratitude to the missionary.

"How long," he asked, "have your people had this glorious Gospel?" Mr. Taylor told him it had been known for hundreds of years. "Is it possible?" the convert exclaimed. "My father died without knowing it and you had the glad tidings in your possession so long and have only now come to tell us! Oh, why did you not come earlier?" That question Mr. Taylor found it difficult to answer. He carried it home with him when in 1860 he returned to England self free, might call for service." Within a few months the call came. The impression was wrought in his soul that it was in China that the Lord wanted him. He acquainted his minister with his conviction not until 1853 that the way to work in China opened for him. He had declared himself ready to go, though he should have to go as a common sailor. But there was no need for such a method. The Chinese

THE HUMAN FACE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Text: Eccl. 8: 1: "A man's wisdom maketh his face to shine and the boldness of his face shall be changed," or, as it may be rendered, "the sourness of his face shall be sweetened."

THUS a little change in our English translation brings out the better meaning of the text, which sets forth that the character of the face is decided by the character of the soul. The main features of our countenance were decided by the Almighty, and we cannot change them; but under God we decide whether we shall have countenances, benignant or baleful, sour or sweet, wrathful or genial, benevolent or mean, honest or scoundrelly, impudent or modest, courageous or cowardly, frank or sneaking. In all the works of God there is nothing more wonderful than the human countenance. Though the longest face is less than twelve inches from the hair line of the forehead to the bottom of the chin, and the broadest face is less than eight inches from cheek bone to cheek bone, yet in that small compass God hath wrought such differences that the sixteen hundred million of the human race may be distinguished from each other by their facial appearances. The face is ordinarily the index of character. It is the throne of the emotions. It is the battle-field of the passions. It is the catalogue of character. It is the map of the mind. It is the geography of the soul. And while the Lord decides before our birth whether we shall be handsome or homely, we are by the character we form deciding whether our countenances shall be pleasant or disagreeable. This is so much so that some of the most beautiful faces are unattractive, because of their arrogance or their deceitfulness, and some of the most rugged and irregular features are attractive because of the kindness that shines through them. Accident, or sickness, or scarification may veil the face so that it shall not express the soul, but in the majority of cases give me a deliberate look at a man's countenance and I will tell you whether he is a cynic or an optimist, whether he is a miser or a philanthropist, whether he is noble or ignominious, whether he is good or bad. Our first impression of a man or woman is generally the accurate impression. You at the first glance make up your mind that some man is unworthy of your friendship, but afterward by circumstances being put into intimate association with him, you come to like him, and trust him. Yet, stay with him long enough, and you will be compelled to return to your original estimate of his character, but it will be after he has cheated you out of everything he could lay his hands on. It is of God's mercy that we have these outside indices of character. Phrenology is one index, and while it may be carried to an absurd extent, there is no doubt that you can judge somewhat of a man's character by the shape of his head. Palmistry is another index, and while it may be carried into the fanciful and necromantic, there is no doubt that certain lines in the palm of the hand are indicative of mental and moral traits. Physiognomy is another index, and while the contour of the human face may sometimes mislead us, we can generally, after looking into the eye and noticing the curve of the lip, and the spread of the nostril, and the correlation of all the features, come to a right estimate of a man's character. If it were not so, how would we know whom to trust and whom to avoid?

Whether we will or not, physiognomy decides a thousand things in commercial, and financial, and social, and religious domains. From one lid of the Bible to the other there is no science so recognized as that of physiognomy, and nothing more thoroughly taken for granted than the power of the soul to transfigure the face. The Bible speaks of the "face of God," the "face of Jesus Christ," the "face of Esau," the "face of Israel," the "face of Job," the "face of the old man," the shining "face of Moses," the wrathful "face of Pharaoh," the ashes on the face of humiliation, the resurrectionary staff on the face of the dead child, the hypocrites disfiguring their face, and in my text the Bible declares, "A man's wisdom maketh his face to shine and the sourness of his face shall be sweetened." If the Bible has so much to say about physiognomy, we do not wonder that the world has made it a study from the early ages. In vain the English Parliament in the time of George II. ordered publicly whipped and imprisoned those who studied physiognomy. Intelligent people always have studied it and always will study it. The pens of Moses, and Joshua, and Job, and John, and Paul, as well as of Homer, and Hippocrates, and Galen, and Aristotle, and Socrates, and Plato, and Lavater have been dipped into it, and whole libraries of wheat and chaff have been garnered on this theme.

Now, what practical religious and eternal use would I make of this subject? I am going to show that while we are not responsible for our features, the Lord Almighty having decided what they shall be pre-natally, as the Psalmist declares when he writes: "In thy book all my members were written which in continuance were fashioned when as yet there was none of them," yet the character which under God we form will chisel the face most mightily. Every man would like to have been made in appearance an Alcibiades, and every woman would like to have been made a Josephine. We all want to be agreeable. Our usefulness depends so much upon it that I consider it important and Christian for every man and woman to be as agreeable as possible. The sloth, the sloven, the man who does not care how he looks, all such people lack equipment for usefulness.

Now, my text suggests how we may, independent of features, make ourselves agreeable: "A man's wisdom maketh his face to shine and the sourness of his face shall be sweetened." What I say may come too late for many. Their countenance may by long years of hardness have been frozen into stolidity; or by long years of cruel behavior they may have Herodized all the machinery of expression; or by long years of avarice they may have been shylocked until their face is as hard as the precious metal they are hoarding: but I am in time to help multitudes if the Lord will. That it is possible to overcome disadvantages of physiognomy was in this country mightily illustrated by one whose life recently closed after having served in the Presidential Cabinet at Washington. By accident of fire in childhood his face had been more piteously scarred than any human visage that I ever saw. By hard study he rose from being a poor boy to the very height of the legal profession, and when an attorney-general for the United States was needed he entered the Presidential Cabinet. What a triumph over destroyed human countenance! I do not wonder that when an opposing attorney in a Philadelphia court-room cruelly referred to this personal disfigurement, Benjamin F. Brewster replied in these words: "When I was a babe I was a beautiful blue-eyed child. I know this because my dear dead mother told me so; but I was one day playing with my sister, when her clothes took fire, and I ran to her relief, and saved her, but in doing so my clothes took fire, and the fire was not put out until my face was as black as the heart of the scoundrel who has just now referred to my disfigurement." Heroism conquering physical disabilities! That scholarly regular features are not necessary for making powerful impression, witness Paul, who photographs himself as in "bodily presence weak;" and George Whitefield, whose eyes were struck with strabismus; and Alexander H. Stephens, who sat with pale and sick face in invalid's chair while he thrilled the American Congress with his eloquence; and thousands of invalid preachers, and Sabbath-school teachers, and Christian workers. Aye, the most glorious Being the world ever saw was foreseen by Isaiah who described his face bruised, and gashed, and scarified, and said of him, "His visage was so marred more than any man." So you see that the loveliest face in the universe was a scarred face.

And now I am going to tell you of some of the chisels that work for the disfiguration or irradiation of the human countenance. One of the sharpest and most destructive of those chisels of the countenance is Cynicism. That sours the disposition and then sours the face. It gives a contemptuous curl to the lip. It draws down the corners of the mouth and inflates the nostril as with a malodor. What David said in haste they say in their deliberation: "All men are liars;" everything is going to ruin. They do not like the present fashion of hats for women, or of coats for men. They are opposed to the administration, municipal, and state, and national. Somehow, food does not taste as it used to and they wonder why there are no poets, or orators, or preachers as when they were boys. Even Solomon, one of the wisest, and at one time one of the worst, of men, falls into the pessimistic mood, and cries out in the twenty-first chapter of Proverbs, "Who can find a virtuous woman?" If he had behaved himself better and kept in good associations, he would not have written that interrogation point implying the scarcity of good womanhood. Cynicism, if a habit, as it is with tens of thousands of people, writes itself all over the features: hence so many sour visages all up and down the street, all up and down the church and the world. One good way to make the world worse is to say it is worse. It is the chastisement of God that when a man allows his heart to be cursed with cynicism his face becomes gloomed, and scowled, and lachrymosed, and blasted with the same midnight.

But let Christian cheerfulness try its chisel upon a man's countenance. Feeling that all things are for his good, and that God rules, and that the Bible being true the world's floralization is rapidly approaching, and the day when beer-mug, and demijohn, and distillery, and bomb-shell, and rifle-pit, and seventy-four pounders, and roulette-tables, and corrupt book, and satanic printing press will have quit work, the brightness that comes from such anticipation not only gives zest to his work, but shines in his eyes and glows in his cheek and kindles a morning in his entire countenance. Those are the faces I look for in an audience. Those countenances are sections of millennial glory. They are Heaven impersonated. They are the sculpturing of God's right hand. They are hosannas in human flesh. They are hallelujahs alighted. They are Christ re-incarnated. I do not care what your features are or whether you look like your father, or your mother, or look like no one under the heavens—to God and man you are beautiful. Michael Angelo, the sculptor, visiting Florence, some one showed him in a back yard a piece of marble that was so shapeless it seemed of no use, and Angelo was asked if he could make anything out of it, and if so was told he could own it. The artist took the marble, and for nine months shut himself up to work, first trying to make of it a statue of David with his foot on Goliath, but the marble was not quite long enough at the base to make the prostrate form of the giant, and so the artist fashioned the marble into another figure that is to be famous for all time because of its expressiveness. A critic came in and was asked by Angelo for his criticism, and he said it was beautiful, but the nose of the statue was not of right shape. Angelo picked up from the floor some sand and tossed it about the face of the statue, pretending he was using his chisel to make the improvement suggested by the critic. "What do you think of it now?" said the artist. "Wonderfully improved," said the critic. "Well," said the artist, "I have not changed it at all." My friends, the grace of God comes to the heart of a man or woman and then attempts to change a forbidding and prejudicial face into attractiveness. Perhaps the face is most unpromising for the Divine Sculptor. But having changed the heart it begins to work on the countenance with celestial chisel, and into all the lineaments of the face puts a gladness and an expectation that changes it from glory to glory, and though earthly criticism may disapprove of this or that in the appearance of the face, Christ says of the newly created countenance that which Pilate said of Him "Behold the man!"

Here is another mighty chisel for the countenance, and you may call it Revenge, or Hate, or Malevolence. This spirit having taken possession of the heart it encamps seven devils under the eye-brows. It puts cruelty into the compression of the lips. You can tell from the man's looks that he is pursuing some one and trying to get even with him. There are suggestions of Nero, and Robespierre, and Diocletian, and thumb-screws, and racks all up and down the features. Infernal artists with murderers' daggers have been cutting away at that visage. The revengeful heart has built its perdition in the revengeful countenance. Disfiguration of diabolic passion!

But here comes another chisel to shape the countenance, and it is Kindness. There came a moving day, and into her soul moved the whole family of Christian graces, with all the children and grandchildren, and the command has come forth from the heavens that that woman's face shall be made to correspond with her superb soul. Her entire face from ear to ear becomes the canvas on which all the best artists of heaven begin to put their finest strokes, and on the small compass of that face are put pictures of sunrise over the sea, and angels of mercy going up and down ladders all a-flash, and mountains of transfiguration and noon-day in heaven. Kindness! It is the most magnificent sculptor that ever touched human countenance. No one could wonder at the unusual geniality in the face of William Windom, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States after seeing him at the New York banquet just before he dropped dead, turning his wine-glass upside down, saying: "I may be doing this offend some, but by not doing it, I might damage many." Be kind to your friends. Be kind to your enemies. Be kind to the young. Be kind to the old. Morning, noon and night be kind, and the effects of it will be written in the language of your face. That is the Gospel of physiognomy.

A Bayonne merchant was in the south of Europe for his health, and sitting on the terrace one morning in his invalidism, he saw a rider flung from a horse into the river, and without thinking of his own weakness the merchant flung off his invalid's gown and leaped into the stream and swam to the drowning man, and clutching him as he was about to go down the last time, bore him in safety to the bank, when, glancing into the face of the rescued man, he cried, "My God!

I have saved my own son!" All kindness comes back to us in one way or another; if not in any other way then in your own face. Kindness! Show it to others, for the time may come when you will need it yourself. People laughed at the lion because he spared the mouse that ran over him, when by one motion of his paw the monster could have crushed the insignificant disturber. But it was well that the lion had mercy on the mouse, for one day the lion was caught in a trap and roared fearfully because he was held fast by ropes. Then the mouse gnawed off the ropes and let the lion go free. You may consider yourself a lion, but you cannot afford to despise a mouse. When Abraham Lincoln pardoned a young soldier at the request of his mother, the mother went down the stairs of the White House saying, "They have lied about the President's being homely; he is the handsomest man I ever saw." All over that President's rugged face was written the kindness which he so well illustrated when he said: "Some of our generals complain that I impair discipline and subordination in the army by my pardons and respites, but it makes me rested after a hard day's work if I can find some good excuse for saving a man's life, and I go to bed happier as I think how joyous the signing of my name will make him and his family." Kindness! It makes the face to shine while life lasts, and after death puts a summer sunset between the still lips and the smoothed hair, that makes me say sometimes at obsequies, "She seems too beautiful to bury."

But here comes another chisel, and its name is hypocrisy. Christ with one terrific stroke in his Sermon on the Mount described this character: "When ye fast be not as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance; for they disfigure their faces that they may appear unto men to fast." Hypocrisy, having taken possession of the soul it immediately appears in the countenance. Hypocrites are always solemn. They carry several country graveyards in their faces. They are tearful when there is nothing to cry about, and in their prayers they catch for their breath, and have such general dolefulness that they disgust young people with religion. We had one of them in one of my churches. When he exhorted he always deplored the low state of religion in other people, and when he prayed it was an attack of hysteria, and he went into a paroxysm of ohs and ahs that seemed to demand resuscitation. He went on in that way until we had to expel him from church for stealing the property entrusted to him as administrator, and for other vices that I will not mention, and he wrote me several letters not at all complimentary from the West saying that he was daily praying for my everlasting destruction. A man cannot have hypocrisy in his heart without somehow showing it in his face. All intelligent people who witness it know it is nothing but a dramatization.

Here comes another chisel, and that belongs to the old-fashioned religion. It first takes possession of the whole soul, washing out its sins by the blood of the Lamb and starting heaven right there and then. This done deep down in the heart, Religion says, "Now let me go up to the windows and front gate of the face and set up some signal that I have taken possession of this castle. I will celebrate the victory by an illumination that no one can mistake. I will make even the wrinkles of his face look like furrows plowed for the harvests of joy. I will make what we call the 'crow's feet' around his temples suggestive that the dove of peace has been alighting there." There may be signs of trouble on that face, but trouble sanctified. There may be scars of battle on that face, but they will be scars of campaigns won.

"Now," says some one, "I know very good people who have no such religion in their faces." My friend, the reason probably is that they were not converted until late in life. Worldliness and sin had been at work with their chisels on that face for thirty or forty years, and Grace, the Divine Sculptress, has been busy with her chisel only five or ten years. Do not be surprised that Phidias and Greenough with their fine chisels cannot in a short while remove all the marks of the stone-mason's crowbar which has been busy there for a long while. I say to all the young, if you would have sympathetic face, hopeful face, courageous face, cheerful face, kind face, at the earliest possible moment, by the grace of God, have planted in your soul sympathy, and hope, and courage, and good cheer, and kindness.

Oh, the power of the human face! I warrant that you have known faces so magnetic and impressive that though they vanished long ago they still hold you with a holy spell. How long since your child went? "Well," you say, "if she had lived she would have been ten years old now, or twenty, or thirty years." But does not that infant face still have tender supremacy over your entire nature? During many an face in her lap and have a good cry. But I can tell you of a more sympathetic, and more tender, and more loving face than any of the faces I have mentioned. "No, you cannot," says some one. I can, and I will. It is the face of Jesus as he was on earth and is now in heaven. What a gentle face it must have been to induce babes to struggle out of their mothers' arms into his arms! What an expressive face it must have been when one reproving look of it threw stalwart Peter into a fit of tears! What a pleading face it must have been to lead the Psalmist in prayer to say of it, "Look upon the face of Thine Anointed." What a sympathetic face it must have been to encourage the sick woman who was beyond any help from the doctors, to touch the hem of his garment! What a suffering face it must have been when suspended on the perpendicular and horizontal pieces of the wood of martyrdom, and his antagonists slapped the pallid cheek with their rough hands, and befouled it with the saliva of their blasphemous lips! What a tremendous face it must have been to lead St. John to describe it in the coming Judgment as scattering the universe when he says, "From whose face worn and weary and broken in health by hard labor. He asked the question of the churches and societies at home and asked them for men and money: that such a reproach might exist no longer.

Mr. Taylor severed his connection with the Chinese Evangelization Society before his return to England. His study of the Bible had convinced him that the missionary should go forward in faith, trusting God alone for the means. When, therefore, he spoke for China in any church or in any meeting, he would have no collection taken up, but would describe the need of China and dwell on the duty of meeting it, leaving his hearers to make the application for themselves. And truly he had a terrible story to tell. There were only ninety-one missionaries in China, and with the exception of Hank-how, they were all near the eastern coast. The interior of the country had not been touched. Eleven vast provinces with an aggregate population of one hundred and thirty millions had not a single Protestant missionary. The heart of the religious public was deeply moved by the story. Volunteers offered themselves and funds were placed in Mr. Taylor's hands to send them out. Every volunteer was told that all he could expect was food and raiment. The Lord had promised those to his servants, but there was no prospect of gain. But none drew back. They came from all denominations and in such numbers that a society was formed with Mr. Taylor as director in China, and a council in England to receive funds and forward supplies to him. Thus the China Inland Mission was formed. After five years incessant labor in presenting the claims of China to the English Christians, Mr. Taylor returned to China taking with him sixteen consecrated workers. Since that time he has returned several times with new demands for men and is now asking for a hundred more. He has now 504 missionaries employed in fourteen provinces, besides 323 native helpers. Of these missionaries, forty-seven have come from the United States and Canada, and thirty-four of them receive their support from their own countries. No less than ninety-five of Mr. Taylor's staff of missionaries are unpaid. Many of them have private property from the proceeds of which they pay their own expenses and draw nothing from the mission. The others are leading lives of faith looking to God alone for the means of subsistence. The income of the mission is derived in the same way. No appeals for funds have ever been made. There have been times of straitsness, but the matter has been laid before God in prayer and funds have always been supplied in time to meet the need. This plan has commended itself to the people of God in all lands, and auxiliaries have been formed to receive the funds which may be sent in for the use of the mission. There are now offices in London and other English cities, at various places in Europe, in Australia, and one has been opened in Canada for the convenience of American contributors. It is under the charge of Mr. H. W. Frost, Cor. Church and Charles Streets, Toronto, Ont. At all these places money is received as God inclines his stewards to send it, but no one is importuned to give. The money so received at all points during 1892, made an aggregate of $167,199.20.

The work done by these devoted missionaries is truly astonishing. Of the eleven provinces, which, when Mr. Taylor organized the China Inland Mission, were without a single missionary, ten have already been occupied. From one of the ten, the missionaries have been driven out, but they are doing itinerant work by journeys over the border. Excursions have been made into the eleventh province, and strong hopes are entertained that the way may be opened to plant a station there also. The older Societies also have worked with increased energy; and now the proportion of the missionaries to population in China is one missionary to every half million persons. There are now in China about forty-five thousand native converts, or one Christian to every 5,500 heathen. Much, it is clear remains to be done, but the Christian Church has every reason for encouragement in the progress that has already been made.

eventide does it not look at you? In your dreams do you not see it? What a sanctifying, hallowing influence it has been in your life. Or, was it a father's face? The storms of life had somewhat roughened it. A good deal of the brightness of the eye had been quenched, and the ear was turned with the hand behind it in order to hear at all. But you remember that face so vividly that if you were an artist you could put it on canvas, and it would mean to you more than any face that Rembrandt ever sketched. That face though long ago veiled from human sight is as plain in your memory as though you this moment saw it moving gently forward and backward in the rocking-chair by the stove in the old farm-house. Or, was it your mother's face? A good mother's face is never homely to her boys and girls. It is a Madonna in the picture gallery of the memory. What a sympathetic face it was! Did you ever have a joy and that face did not respond to it? Did you ever have a grief and no tears trickled down that maternal cheek? Did you ever do a bad thing and a shadow did not cross it? Oh, it was a sweet face! The spectacles with large, round glasses through which she looked at you, how sacredly they have been kept in bureau or closet! Your mother's face, your mother's smile, your mother's tears! What an overpowering memory! Though you have come on to mid-life, or old age, how you would like just once more to bury your the earth and the heaven fled away." Oh, Christ! Once the Nazarene, but now the Celestial! Once of Cross, but now of Throne! Once crowned with stinging bramble, but now coroneted with the jewels of ransomed empires! Turn on us thy pardoning face and forgive us; thy sympathetic face and console us; thy suffering face and have thy atonement avail for us; thy omnipotent face and rescue us. Oh, what a face! So scarred, so lacerated, so resplendent, so overwhelmingly glorious that the seraphim put wing to wing, and with their conjoined pinions keep off some of the lustre that is too mighty even for eyes cherubic or archangelic; and yet this morning turning upon us with a sheathed splendor like that with which he appeared when he said to the mothers bashful about presenting their children, "Suffer them to come;" and to the poor wail of the street, "Neither do I condemn thee;" and to the eyes of the blind beggar of the wayside, "Be opened." I think my brother John, the returned foreign missionary, dying summer before last at Bound Brook, caught a glimpse of that face of Christ when in his dying hour my brother said, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in his likeness." And now unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion, forever and ever, Amen and Amen! Amen and Amen!

DESTITUTE HOMES GLADDENED.

The "Food Fund" still Extending its Christian Work among the Poor—Some Kind Letters from Contributors—Even the Children want to Share the Blessing of Giving—What it Costs to Feed a Family by "The Christian Herald" Relief Plan.

Such a letter is the following:

FEVERIA MILLS, CAL., Feb. 6, 1894.
DR. LOUIS KLOPSCH, Proprietor, Christian Herald.

DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—Enclosed please find Wells Fargo money orders to the amount of one hundred and ten dollars, to aid in succoring the destitute. I read with deep emotion the touching account of suffering of the poor in New York City which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Jan. 25, and of the noble self-sacrifice of Rev. Stephen Merritt. I felt that I wanted to have a part in this grand work; I wanted to share the burden which was resting upon this one man; I wanted to buy a little of the world's sorrow and grief and hunger and wretchedness, so I cried aloud to the Lord in my closet to show me what he would have me to do, and he impressed me by his Spirit to speak to my comrades in the mine and ask their aid. The next day, after we had finished our lunch in the blacksmith shop, I rose in much fear and trembling and told the men what I had read in your paper, and told them I would forward to you any contributions they might feel disposed to give, asking you at the same time to acknowledge the receipt of the money in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, also to write a personal letter to be read to them. My heart has wondered and rejoiced every day since at the hearty responses which came to me from all sides. These men are all poor, they are working long hours, at a low salary; they climb a steep mountain through fiercest snowstorms to get to their work, and most of them have large families to support; but God so touched their hearts that they seemed eager, yea anxious, to give whatever they could afford to relieve this deep distress.

A great many letters come from church and Sunday School societies, Ladies' Aid, Sewing Circles, Christian Endeavor, Mothers' Meetings, King's Daughters, etc., which have made collections for the suffering poor. Many teachers in day schools and similar institutions and not a few classes in colleges have also forwarded subscriptions.

Mrs. Minnie Johnson, Windom, Minn., in enclosing fifty cents, adds, "I only wish it were one hundred times as much." This sentiment is echoed in scores of letters from other readers. "May the blessing of God attend your grand and glorious work," writes Mrs. Robert Hart, Watertown, N. Y. "I thank God for the privilege of his love, and for the ability to help others in their time of trouble" is the fervent expression of A. A. Berry, Herkimer, N. Y. Walter S. and Sister, Sartaria, Mass., write, "I only wish we could do more, but I trust that God will move the hearts of those who are able to give richly so the Fund may increase according as the want increases." Two little boys, C. V., N. Y., contribute fifty cents, "To help the poor and suffering." "Three loving little helpers," Hackensack, N. J., forward fifty cents with the promise to repeat this gift every week. The W. C. T. U., of Chittenango, N. Y., per Alice Carl, Sec., forwards $5, with the hope that God will bless the good work and open other hearts to give. "I send $1 for the feeding of a starving family for half a week," sympathetically writes Mr. L. S. Coon, of Cambridge, N. Y.

It has been said that the poor help the poor. A lady writing from Wilbraham, Mass. (enclosing $1), says, "I have hard times at home, but thank God I and mine have not had to go hungry." Another contributor from Memphis, Tenn. ($1), says,

"I have a little yet to do with those who are worse off than myself, and am making a small investment with the Lord and he has repaid me a hundred fold. That is how I have managed to live so long without work. It is truly a delightful thing to give in his name."

A lady from Pepin, Wis. ($2), writes, "Help some poor old widow with the enclosed. I am a poor old widow myself. I wish I could send more." "A Sympathizing woman" (25 cents), writes, "Use the enclosed silver quarter to buy food for some of the starving in your city."

One of the most beautiful phases of the Food Fund charity, is the deep spiritual interest which the children of Christian families are taking in the work. Many of the letters we receive containing contributions are from those dear little people, who, having comfortable homes and beautiful surroundings of their own, feel sad at heart to contemplate the state of the ragged and hungry little ones in the destitute homes of New York. With pure, childish enthusiasm, they write—many of them straight from the heart—and we have read their letters with admiration and surprise. One mother, from Portland, Me., writing for a group of little ones, says: "As I read and explained to them of the suffering children in your city, their hearts were touched, and they wanted a share in giving some little mouths a good warm meal, and so they dedicated the contents of their money-box to that end."

R. V. McC. from Ryno, Neb., (twenty-five cents) writes:

This is for bread for some hungry little boy. It is my own money. I am a boy seven years old, and have plenty to eat, and am very sorry for those little ones THE CHRISTIAN HERALD speaks about.

H. Buente, Warrensburg, Mo., writes: Little Eldy, who had earned some money for carrying in wood, said: "I will give 25 cents, so that can buy ten meals; then little Lulu, though not old enough to know what it is for, was willing to give up her three bright, new pennies, to buy one meal; Mamma next said she would give $1 to buy forty meals, and Laura that she would give 25 cents, to buy ten meals. Then our two older boys, Frank and Bismarck, said they would give $1 apiece to buy eighty meals, and I, as the head of the family, must give $2. So in five minutes, we made up $5.53, which I herewith inclose, and pray the Lord may bless it and the noble work."

Subscriber, Spring Grove, Va., writes: "These twenty cents my little son and daughter send for the hungry little boys and girls, they say." "Put before them the bread of eternal life," writes A. E. Conant, Osceola, Mo. "God bless you in the grand work in which you are engaged," is the prayer of the Burlington Y.P.S. C.E. ($4.)

Mrs. P. R., Licking, Mo., writes:

My dear boy died at the age of fourteen; he had given his heart to God two years before. Among the little things he left was 50 cents. He has been asleep in Jesus twelve years, and many times since then I could have found a use for the 50 cents, but it was one of his treasures to me. I am sure if he were living he would delight in giving his little mite to be used for Jesus now, and so I send it.

J. H. P., Chestertown, N. Y. ($5), an aged Christian, says very touchingly:

I wish I could send more but I am getting old 74 most done with things here; but want to do all the good I can before I do go.

M. H. K., Lima, N. Y., (representing ten others, sending $3.99), writes:

I send prayers that the Lord who made Heaven and earth would make the "Food Fund" like the widow's barrel of meal and cruse of oil.

W. F. Thressen, Danbury, Neb., writes in a most practical way:

After reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, my wife and I feel as if we couldn't place two dollars to any better advantage than to help the poor and needy who are under your care. God bless all who assist.

Mrs. G. R. H., Shelter Island, N. Y., ($30, and package of clothing), writes:

My little boy of three, on being told about the poor hungry little boys, brought three cents from his bank, saying, "he wanted five cents 'till he had a breakfast."

Mr. and Mrs. David Smith, Manica, Ill., ($5) send with their gift a prayer that the work of the Food Fund may be spiritually prospered, and add: "God bless the kind and large-hearted lady, Mrs. Louis Klopsch. May God raise up many like her to do this work."

A feature of the Fund which cannot be overlooked, is the extraordinary number of contributions of clothing that have come from different parts of the country. Barrels, dry-goods boxes, hampers, packages and parcels of all shapes and sizes, by express and as freight, have come pouring in at the rate of a dozen deliveries a day. These have contained supplies of every kind of garments for both men and women; dresses, underwear, hosiery, linen, knit goods, men's coats, trousers, vests, shirts, baby-wear, etc. One kind-hearted contributor—no doubt some thoughtful mother, with little ones of her own—forwarded half a dozen pairs of dainty little baby-knit socks, in different colors, each little shoe tied with the tiniest string of ribbon. Up to the present time it is estimated that nearly five thousand garments of all descriptions in all have been received by the Fund, most of which have been distributed to the best advantage. We might easily fill a page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in describing the gratitude and pleasure of the poor who receive these garments through the Fund. Mothers, in tattered and faded skirts now made to look respectable and unquestionably comfortable; children, shoeless and hatless and ragged enough in all conscience, rendered neat and comfortable for the first time probably in their little lives.

In view of the many offers that have come from friends in the country to send farm produce, potatoes, etc., for the Fund, we would ask those residing within 100 miles of New York, to send us their names and addresses, and bags will be forwarded. The freight on all such contributions will be paid at this end if necessary.

During the week the Food Fund has still further extended its work by the opening of two more Relief Stations, one being at the corner of Washington Square and University cents per day, receiving, besides, their luncheon and a small supply of groceries.

The spiritual aspect of the relief work of the Food Fund is indicated in the letters received from some of the city pastors who are now co-operating in this charity.

Rev. C. Wright, pastor of Bedford St., M. E. Church, writes: "Only the recipients of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bounty will ever know all the good accomplished by the distribution of the excellent provisions given through your instrumentality. Honest, temperate, hard-working men, who said they never before had taken help, accepted your gift with tearful eyes and thankful expression. Could your readers have heard the earnest 'God bless you,' and seen the tears in many eyes among those who never before appealed for aid, we think it would have been some slight recompense for the aid, God put it into their heart to provide and which has been so graciously and unostentatiously carried into the homes of the poor of this city. I am personally and in behalf of the poor people around me, exceedingly grateful to you and to those who have made these benefactions possible."

Rev. A. B. Stansberry, pastor, African M. E. Church, Sullivan St., writes: "You will not know in this world the good you have done for the destitute poor of God's people and others."

Rev. J. C. Thoms, Pastor Mariner's Temple, Oliver Street, writes: "We have found, among the cases ministered to, a deep gratitude. We give into every basket that comes for groceries, a carefully prepared tract containing Scripture texts, at the same time trying to carry out your wishes as well as our own in teaching that it is through the love of God that they receive these gifts. There have been several cases of conversion, or rather confession, among those who have secretly believed but have been afraid until now to confess Jesus Christ. 'Now,' they say, 'We are convinced that the love of Jesus Christ means something. Those who do not love Jesus, do not care for the poor, and if the love of Christ would lead people to be so kind and good, we desire to believe in Christ.' The work of charity is making a very deep impression on the Hebrews and the Italians."

The missionary in charge of the distribution at Station No. 7 (the mission in connection with Calvary Baptist Church), writes: "I had a strong and willing band of helpers both in the distribution and putting up the packages. The attendance at the meetings at this branch has been greatly increased and our efforts have been wonderfully blessed. On Tuesday last six came forward and on Thursday five, expressing a wish to be prayed for and desiring to give their hearts to Christ."

Mrs. Bella Cooke writes: "To tell you how happy you have made me would I fear be impossible. I have engaged a number of King's Daughters and Sons in the distribution of food to our poor people, who came here to be served, so I can say a word to them for Jesus Christ. It was a most touching sight, and tears filled many eyes as I tried to lead them first to the Giver of all good, and then to our dear friends."

One of the most interesting stations is that established at 128 Forsyth Street, in the Hebrew-Christian Mission, of which Rev. Herman P. Faust is the pastor. This station is in the very heart of the great foreign section of the East Side, with a mixed population of Russians, Poles, Austrians, Hungarians and Hebrews. Among these people the suffering has been almost general, and thousands of humble families have been without bread or fire for days. At the Forsyth Street Station, Dr. Faust gathered the heads of 100 of the most deserving of these destitute families, and they were supplied with a week's provisions by the Food Fund—Hebrews and Christians being served alike, regardless of denomination, for want had made all equally necessitous. Preceding the distribution Dr. Faust read to the assembled applicants the 23d Psalm, and explained the loving character of Christ as manifested in his love for men and his sacrifice on the Cross. Many of these families have given evidence of being deeply touched by the Christian charity of which they are the beneficiaries.

The contributions to the Food Fund received during the week are only partially acknowledged on the next page. Nearly 2,000 names remain to be acknowledged, and in an issue of twenty pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at an early date, four entire pages will be devoted to these acknowledgments. Contributions of clothing, etc., are acknowledged on page 135 of this issue.

Place and the other at No. 176 Franklin St. At each of these, fifty suffering families are being supplied with food. The total cost of the week's supplies of groceries, coal, oil and bread for the various stations is now considerably in excess of the contributions, and the result is that last week, the expense of maintaining the Relief Stations was $600 in excess of the income from the patrons of the Fund. We are confident, however, that having put their hand to the plough they will not turn back, nor permit the good work they have auspiciously begun and which they have generously supported, to languish at so critical a time. Every dollar thus far contributed has been expended with the most rigid economy, with the view of obtaining the largest supplies of plain, wholesome food of good quality at the lowest price. It will astonish many to know that not only has the original estimate of two and one-half cents per meal been borne out by the result of the experiment, but the actual cost of a meal is even less, being a fraction over 2 cents. The following table shows the actual cost of food, heat and light for a family of five persons for one week, as now supplied through the Food Fund:

JACOB AT BETHEL.

S. S. Lesson for March 11. Gen. 28: 10-22. Golden Text, Gen. 28: 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

JACOB is the type of a large number of such as are true believers, so far as they go, but whose lives are not of the Abraham type. They are as the "heir" in a state of childhood who differs nothing from a bondservant, though he be lord of all; but is under guardians and stewards until the time appointed of the father. R.V. Jacob partly trusted God, and partly trusted himself, he partly sought the glory of God and partly his own interests. God could not have trusted Jacob with the tests to which he could call an Abraham. While Abraham carried out God's purpose, voluntarily, and at a cost to himself, so manifesting God's likeness in his walk and conversation—Jacob served God's purpose in spite of himself by calling forth the faithfulness of God to his covenant and his patience and forbearance in bearing with one who understood and honored him so little.

God will be Glorified through all his children, if not in all his children. A wayward, heartless son who sets himself against all the tender holy influence of a godly mother, nevertheless serves God's purpose in educating that mother, and so giving him the opportunity to manifest his grace in her in almost impossible circumstances. Jacob had obtained the birthright from his brother, but how should he get his father's consent to this shameful transaction? Once off the lines of true rectitude, a child of God must meet with all kinds of hindrances. God is against the way which he takes. Knowing that God had foretold to Rebekah, his mother, that he should take precedence of his brother, Jacob nevertheless had not confidence enough in God to trust him that he would accomplish this purpose unless he himself had a hand in bringing it about. In the depth of his heart, he trusted himself more than God. How far may his mother have been responsible for this! It was a pitiable step for a mother to take when Rebekah made her plan for her darling son to deceive his blind and aged father. She was sowing the seed in her son for a life of crookedness; she was saying to him practically: "God is not to be fully trusted; by foul means, if fair means will not succeed, we must secure to ourselves what he has promised." Thus the mother and the son dishonored God by unbelief, sowing want of confidence in the heart of Isaac, who could never again trust his wife as he had done before. They set the example of duplicity before their household, and showed that people who believe in God and set a value on his Word of promise, can yet be double in their dealings! They made the conversion of the high-spirited but comparatively upright Esau almost impossible, and they broke up the peace of the family.

God Must Interpose

when his children thus wrong him. Such things could not go on unrebuked. God hates sin, while he loves the sinner. The love was strong between the mother and the son, and it was just on this point that trial must come. Esau, unconverted as he was, despised and hated his brother Jacob. Inconsistent believers are held in the utmost contempt by those of the unconverted who have something of natural nobility about them. It was a sad time for this family. The father had wrought his own way, and not God's, in giving the blessing, and had thwarted him in the most painful way. All the three who were on God's side had failed, and the most religious in the family was the unconverted son! How often this happens where God's children are not of the true Abraham types; not fully entering into God's purpose to make man like himself! There was but one solution to the situation. Jacob the home-loving and mother-loving man must go out from home, and know the bitter pangs of a separation which his own sin and his mother's had made necessary. He must go forth, truly with his father's blessing, but without his father's confidence or esteem, he must go, with the bitter remorse that he had hearkened to his mother, and knowing that his brother had thought of murder against him in his heart! Oh, the bitterness of that farewell! Oh, the loneliness of that journey with a bleeding, broken heart! Yet God had bruised Jacob in love, and where the failure of the child was greatest, there the love of the heavenly Father could be most manifest.

Isaac awoke in these terrible circumstances to a sense of his calling as a son of Abraham; he recognized the hand of God in the blessing coming to Jacob, and in sending him away, he set before him as an object in his journey that he should go to his mother's family and take a wife, and by faith in God, he added: "And God Almighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people; and give thee the blessing of Abraham, to thee and to thy seed with thee." He awoke to as Jacob's father. Shame, remorse, loneliness and bitter regret might lead his son to despair, if he had not some object set before him, and in this first step which was in accordance with the will of God, Jacob's parents were united. The way of the Lord is the point of unity for his children; it extricated from every difficulty. And now Jacob was alone. It is a blessed thing for one who has sinned to get alone. Free from the influences and the circumstances which have led to his fall, a child of God who has gone wrong is in a position to listen to the voice of God. Probably Jacob's sense of misery and humiliation was at its culminating point when, exhausted in mind and body, he lay down in a certain place because the sun was set, "and took of the stones of that place and set them for his pillows." All was so different to his home. But, may be the old family custom of gathering together for prayer may have been the last thing upon his mind, and a real cry to God, perhaps the most real which his heart had ever breathed, went up to heaven and a sense of being not quite alone may have been the result.

In any case, he dreamed. When the Bible was still unwritten, God spoke to his people in dreams and visions. No doubt that Jacob's last dreary impression from external things, as he lost himself in sleep, was the weary terrible sense of distance and separation. Far away from home, far away from God, far away from the faith of his grandfather Abraham. And, in his dream he saw just what he needed—a ladder. It was "set up on the earth" where he lay, the sinful miserable Jacob, and as his eyes became accustomed to its light, he traced it higher and higher, and "the top of it reached to heaven." Heaven had never before been opened to Jacob, could it be, that to him the liar and the outcast, the deceiver of his poor blind father, the supplanter of his only brother—could it be that Heaven was Open to him?

This was more crushing than all his shame and Jacob knew God as a God of love. From the first, and even all through his sin, Jacob had valued the heavenly and he did not get weary, after the first glimpse of the heavenly vision. As his eyes rested upon the ladder, he saw angels ascending and descending and he learned that there was a way by which even he could have to do with God, and God with him. Had he understood all God was ready to reveal to him, Jacob might have led an Abraham life from that time, but Jacob did not learn to yield himself up without reserve.

"Behold, the Lord God stood above it, and said: I am the God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac, the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it and to thy seed, and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth (not as the stars of heaven); and thou shalt spread abroad to the west and to the east and to the north and to the south, and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. And behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again to this land, for I will not leave thee until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of." Could it then be possible that God would renew his covenant with one so unworthy? Even so, for "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." How humiliated Jacob must have felt; yet how joyful as he realized that in spite of all he had done, in spite of all his deceit and untruthfulness, God had not changed. He was no longer alone. God was with him.

BETHEL.

whom he loves. Much sanctity was attached to the blessing of a father, and Isaac wishes Esau to have it. Therefore, knowing that death might come to him suddenly, when Esau was absent on one of his hunting expeditions, he resolves to anticipate the usual time for giving his blessing and arranges with Esau to have the solemn ceremony at once. But first he must have his favorite venison. How many a time a man has been thwarted in some plan by insisting that first of all he must indulge himself once more! Isaac was dull as well as blind, otherwise he might have had some presentiment of what a clever woman and a cunning son might do. Before the time of the ceremony, which was to take place in the evening, after Isaac had feasted, Rebekah makes her plot and confides it to Jacob. There seems to have been no compunction in either of them about deceiving the blind old man. The only objection Jacob raises is as to the danger of discovery. Rebekah provides for that, and Jacob when challenged is ready with his blasphemous lie about God bringing the venison to him. Rebekah is soon in fear for the safety of her favorite. Esau will kill him and she wants him out of the way. Even then, she cannot choose the straight course, but goes to Isaac with a story about Jacob needing a wife, and secures his absence in that way. To Jacob she tells the real reason for his journey and bids him stay with her brother a few days. Thus Jacob starts and is away for forty years, instead of only a few days, and we may suppose that she never sees him again. That was her punishment for her sin. She had forgotten that Laban was as accomplished a deceiver as herself and that her son, who so far had prospered by plots, might now suffer by plots. Little did she foresee that, all his life long, Jacob would suffer so, that he would be deceived by his sons as he had deceived his father.

Jacob's journey led him northward to the borders of Chaldea, about four hundred and fifty miles. At the end of the second or third day he arrives at that sublime scene which travelers have so often described. Mountain above mountain raises its head like a gigantic stairway until in the far distance the highest mountain penetrates the clouds. As Jacob, accustomed to the level plain around Beersheba, looks upon the scene, illuminated by the setting sun, it would make a deep impression on his mind. It naturally recurs in his dream, when having found a suitable stone for a pillow, he throws himself on the ground for the night's sleep of the tired traveler. But, as it seems to him in his dream, the mountain range is no longer solitary. Angels are using the stairway and a voice is speaking to him the familiar words which he had doubtless heard many times from his grandfather, Abraham, and his father, Isaac. He wakes up in surprise. God is here and he knew it not. He probably thought that only at Beersheba, where Abraham and Isaac lived, could God be found. The fugitive was afraid. It was a dreadful place to him. He was in the presence of God though he had not been aware of it. He calls the place Beth-el, the house of God. When he recovers, his natural instinct asserts itself and he offers God a bargain. If God will keep his promise then Jacob will give him a tenth of all that he gets. Jacob has learned much of God by the time he resumes his journey, but he has still much to learn.

The Lord is in this place and I knew it not. Tolstoi tells a beautiful story of a cobbler who read much of Christ and wished he had lived in his day. He read late one night and fell asleep directly he retired. He had a vivid dream in which he thought he heard Christ telling him that he would visit him the next day. The cobbler awoke full of joy. He cleaned up the dingy basement in which he slept and worked, and looking around wondered what he could do make it fit for the reception of the divine Guest. He waited all morning, but no one came. Looking up at the window anxiously he saw an old man shovelling snow. He was very feeble and the work seemed too much for him. The cobbler looked at him pityingly and finally called him in to share his tea with him. The man came and was cheered and refreshed. A little later he saw a poor woman with a sick child. Them too he invited in and gave them soup. It was getting toward evening and still Christ did not come. The cobbler was too restless to remain in the basement. He went up the steps to the street and looked this way and that for his expected guest. There was a disturbance outside and the cobbler looked. A boy was being dragged to prison by a woman from whom he had stolen an apple. The cobbler interceded for him and paid the woman for the apple he had stolen. Then he went back to his basement and opened his New Testament to read as his habit was. Again he fell asleep. He heard a voice calling him by name. The cobbler answered and the voice said reproachfully, "did you not recognize me?" He looked around and saw in a kind of haze the old man to whom he had given the tea. "And me?" said the voice again. The cobbler saw the woman and child. "And me?" and he saw the boy whom he had saved from prison. The cobbler was wide awake now and returned wondering to his reading. The pages had blown over and were open at a new place. The cobbler read, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Set it up for a pillar. Mr. Morier, describing his journey through Persia, says that on approaching Istakhar he noticed his guide carefully selecting a stone which he placed on the top of another. Asking the reason of this proceeding, he was informed that stones so set up indicated that a traveller had there made a prayer for safe return, or made a vow, or thanksgiving. Nothing was more common at this day, the guide said, than for a solitary weary traveler to sit himself down and raising such a stone as a witness make the vow that Jacob did.

I will surely give the tenth unto thee. Oberlin reading in the Old Testament the rule of the tenths said, "If the Jew gave a tenth surely I who have so many more blessings than the Jew cannot be satisfied with a tenth; I will give three tenths. He continued to do so and when he received hundreds of dollars where he had received tens before he gave thirty dollars out of every hundred.

Thou shalt spread abroad to the west and to the East. In 1866 at a gathering of four students of Williams College under lee of a hay-stack, where they had taken refuge from a thunder-storm, one of the number, Samuel S. Mills, proposed that they attempt to send the Gospel to the heathen, and said: "We can do it if we will." The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which now has over three thousand laborers in the field grew out of this incident four years later. A monument commemorates the event of its origin through the simple beginning of the "hay-stack" prayer-meeting.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE KING OF BELLS.

RECENT complaints from residents in the neighborhood of a certain church in New York, of the ringing of bells have aroused a discussion as to the value of bells as adjuncts of worship. The bells of the church in question are now rung by electricity, and the persons complaining of them aver that they are inharmonious, and that the electricity in attempting to strike a double chord produces a discord which has a distressing effect on the nerves of the listeners. A point of interest in relation to this discussion is the fact that the greatest bell in the world has been silent since its birth. It is the Tsar Kolokol or King of Bells, which is in the Kremlin at Moscow in Russia. A picture of this enormous bell appears on this page. The Russians regard it with great veneration. It was originally cast in the fourteenth century, but it fell and was broken. The Empress Anne had it recast in 1733, and the occasion was one of great solemnity. While the immense mass of metal was in a molten condition the Empress and her nobles cast in money and silver-plate to add to the richness of its sound. Before it could be hung, there was a fire in the cathedral of the Assumption, where it was to be placed, and some heavy timbers fell upon the bell and broke a piece, weighing eleven tons, out of it. The bell itself weighs over two hundred tons. It is two feet thick, nineteen feet high and sixty feet in circumference. It has been placed on a granite pedestal and its interior is used as a chapel. About forty persons can be accommodated under it. It is extraordinary that a bell so large and so rich in metal should never have uttered a note, or have been used for the purpose for which it was designed. There is, however, a similar apparent waste of material in humanity. Some of the most gifted men, whose natural talents and acquirements fit them for doing conspicuous service for their Maker, are through some flaw in their moral character rendered silent and useless. (Matt. 11: 25.)

The Farmers' Enemies.

Reports have been in circulation for some weeks past of certain foreign pests of the weevil species having been introduced into our country, among the foreign grain exhibits at the World's Fair. The reports having caused widespread alarm among farmers, Prof. C. V. Riley, of the Department of Agriculture, has written an open letter of a reassuring character. He says that the foreign grain exhibits were carefully watched all through the summer, and several species of the dreaded insect were found, but they were all such as are already common among us. It was not until the middle of September that any new species were detected. Specimens were sent to the Entomological experts, and it was found that four of them were unknown here. The Professor says, however, that they all came from tropical countries and could not live in the North. They might thrive in some parts of our extreme Southern States, but care was taken that none of them should be carried thither. He therefore assures the farmers that their apprehensions are groundless and that no additions have been made to the number of their enemies. Unhappily, the same assurance cannot be given as to our spiritual foes. Foreign follies and vices will thrive in any climate, and although they are more ruinous than the insects, we are less on guard against them. (Ps. 106:35.)

A Curious Clue to a Thief.

A detective of Lewiston, Me., has had the satisfaction recently of solving a difficult criminal problem. A burglary was committed in the city at the beginning of last year, the perpetrator of which was not discovered. He took a quantity of money and jewelry and some papers of a private nature which the owner was very anxious to recover. He was concerned about them more than about the valuables. He had given up hope of every getting them back, when, a few days ago, a detective placed them in his hands. The story of their recovery was a strange one. In examining the premises after the robbery the detective had found only one clue. It was a pan of molasses candy which the family had put out of doors to cool on the night of the burglary. There was a curious indentation in the candy, which the detective believed was made by a hammer, which the burglar had laid upon it while breaking in. The hammer must have been of peculiar shape and there was a fracture on one side of it. The detective kept a sharp look-out for that hammer, but did not find it anywhere in the city. He was in a junk-shop recently and saw it in a heap of rubbish. The junk-dealer told him that he had purchased it from a widow. The detective found her out, and she said that the tool had belonged to her husband, who died a week or two before. Asking if the man had left any papers, the detective was told that he had, and on examining them he found the missing package. The criminal probably died in the belief that his crime would never be traced to him, as he would not be the mine well so that he avoided several projections which might have proved fatal. But, near the bottom of the slope, he stumbled over one of the side-beams and fell. He expected to be instantly crushed to death, but the beam arrested the progress of the coal. It was twisted aside and held fast and the man was saved. Thus the obstacle over which he stumbled and which he thought would be the cause of his death, really saved his life; for had the race continued he would probably have been overtaken. It is often so in spiritual experience. Many a man has found salvation when he has been overthrown and feels himself defeated, who could not find it when he was making desperate efforts to save himself. (Rom. 4: 5.)

An Hour Over a Precipice.

A messenger boy had a thrilling experience on Feb. 17, which he is never likely to forget. A dispatch from Pittsburg, Pa., says that the boy was sent to Duquesne Heights to deliver a letter. On the way back he thought he would save car-fare by walking down the incline. He struck across the bluff, stepping carefully through the unbroken snow. After following the track for some distance he took a short cut across the hill. He had not proceeded many yards when the snow gave way beneath him and he felt himself sliding down the side of the cliff. He clutched at everything that of life. He was not like those who having fallen while wandering on the mountains of unbelief and are in peril of eternal death need to be urged to accept the salvation Christ won for them at the cost of his life. (II. Cor. 5: 20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Seven Churches in Brooklyn have Reported an aggregate of two hundred conversions during the present series of special meetings.

Prebendary Pulling, who died in England the other day, at the age of eighty-six years, was the last survivor of the small council of clergymen who arranged the original publication of "Hymns Ancient and Modern."

The American Seamen's Friend Society has just sent out its ten thousandth library. For thirty-five years the average has been 285 libraries a year. The books comprise the writings of the best authors, both secular and religious, including Spurgeon, Moody, Haverlag, Bouar, Hale, Longfellow, Kingsley, etc.

One of the Results of the Recent Labors of Rev. B. Fay Mills in Princeton has been the formation of a society among the students of the senior class of the Seminary, whose object it is to raise volunteers for home mission work. Large delegations of students are now regularly going to the surrounding villages every Sunday to hold evangelistic service.

The Congregational Ministers of Northern New Jersey have adopted the Ritualists' idea of a "Retreat," but with a higher and more practical plan. They spent two days in prayer and meditation on spiritual themes, preparatory to the work before them during Lent. This "retreat" was held in the town of Westfield. The following subjects occupied the attention of those present: "The Realization of God," "The Central Teaching of Christ," "The Way of the Cross," "Helps to the Devout Life," "Our Special Work."

The Strange Accusations against the Professors and pupils of the College of Marsovan, of burning their own college, is now explained. It appears that the Turkish governors use the torture. The Christians are brought into the torture chamber one by one, and are beaten with sticks whilst forcibly held down on their backs and feet. That kind of torture is repeated day after day and night after night until some poor, agonized creature accuses himself and others. The persons thus accused are in turn thrown into prison and tortured after the like manner.

Rev. J. Hudson Taylor whose Portrait Appears in this issue sailed for this country on Feb. 14. At a meeting held in London, to bid him farewell, he said that during the past year eighty-six new missionaries had been added to the field in China, and that one hundred are still needed. There had never been a year when the proportion of deaths had been so small, when more members had been baptized, or when a greater number of candidates had applied for admission. The income of the year had also exceeded that of 1892 by $37,500. Despite all the antagonism they had experienced from the Chinese mobs the lives of all the missionaries had been preserved from violence and injury.

The Moody and Sankey meetings in Washington, D.C., opened with such scenes as have never before been witnessed in the city. The great Convention hall was crowded at the first service half an hour before the time set for opening, and fully seven thousand persons were unable to gain admission. An overflow meeting was held in Assembly Presbyterian Church. The Washington Star says: "It was the greatest religious gathering that has ever been held in the city. It was purely undenominational, Episcopalians sitting next to Presbyterians, and beyond them Methodists, and then Baptists, and so on through all the varieties of sects and creeds. All agreed that if the success of the night is to be continued Washington will experience the greatest religious awakening that it has ever known."

likely to know of the clue he left behind in the impression of his hammer on the candy. Neither do men who sin secretly against God realize that their steps are traced by him who "has set a print on the heels of their feet." (Job 13: 27.)

A Race for Life.

The "Post-Intelligencer" of Seattle, Wash., reports a remarkable escape of a miner from a shocking death. He was working half-way down a slope in the Franklin mine when a huge piece of coal weighing more than a ton became detached and began slowly slipping down the slope. The miner realized that his only escape from being crushed by it lay in outrunning it. He flung down his pick and ran at his utmost speed. It was a race for life for the coal increased its speed at every second and the terrified miner could hear it coming closer and closer to him. To add to his danger his wild rush extinguished the light in his cap and he had to run on in the dark. Fortunately he knew he saw, to save himself from rolling down, but he fell seventy-five feet before his course was checked. He caught a projecting rock with one hand and some tough weeds growing from the side of the precipice with the other. A railroad man saw him suspended in this perilous position and shouted to him to hold on until he could get help. The boy clung desperately, knowing that if he fell he would be dashed to pieces on the rocks two hundred feet below. The railroad man telephoned to the police-station and a squad of men equipped with ropes and tackle came quickly to the scene. A brave man, named Wright, volunteered to go down. A rope was fastened around him and he began the perilous descent. Several times he would have fallen if the rope had not held him. When he reached the boy he put the rope around him and both were safely drawn up. It was a narrow escape, for the boy could not have held on much longer. When his brave rescuer reached him he showed no hesitation in availing himself of his chance

THE ALTERNATE ATTRIBUTES.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Rev. A.

J. Gordon, D.D. Text: Nahum 1: 2: "The Lord is slow to anger and great in power, and will not acquit the wicked: the Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm and the clouds are the dust of his feet."

IT is a constant habit of the prophets to alternate between judgment and mercy in their utterance of revelation. As though the prolonged dwelling upon God's sterner attributes would put too great a strain upon the heart, they change the tone after a little and so relieve the tension. "God is jealous and the Lord revengeth," says the prophet in the opening of his prophecy and in the next section we read: "The Lord is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble." Thus like a revolving light-house which throws forth a flash of brightness and then a blank of darkness, prophecy manifests to us alternately the love and the justice, and the tenderness and severity of God, that we may not forget the one while contemplating the other. Consider: I. The slowness and strength of

God's Anger:

"He is slow to anger but of great power." This is grandly characteristic of God. A quick temper is a mark of smallness of nature. A misstep on the side of an Indian's canoe will capsize and swamp it; but it will not affect a great ocean steamer in the slightest. And if you tread on the dignity of small and selfish people they immediately get angry and lose their temper; but a calm, selfpossessed person is not disturbed by any such affront. And so I think it a very sublime saying concerning Jehovah that he is slow to anger. The majesty of omnipotent restraint, holds him in calmness and self-possession while sinners insult and provoke him to wrath. Why does not God blast and consume the infidel blasphemer with the lightning of his indignation? we ask. When a noted atheist once lecturing before a Boston audience, took out his watch and holding it in his hand, said, "If there be a God let him prove it by striking me dead in five minutes," some Christians wondered why the Lord did not do it. As well wonder why Queen Victoria does not halt the royal procession in which she is riding, to cuff the ears of some rude boy, who because he has imbibed anarchistic notions, has come out to mock and make faces at his sovereign. There is a sublime fitness in the divine delay to punish sin. And when unbelievers taunt you with the word of Scripture—"God is angry with the wicked every day"—saying, "Then your God is a quick-tempered Deity, is he?" you may reply, "Though our God is sometimes angry, he is neither hot-headed nor passionate. And so far from divine wrath being something out of harmony with the character of a righteous God it is absolutely necessary to our conception of such a being. For in the first place, every attribute must have its counter-part. As there can be no light without darkness, so there can be no mercy without judgment. God is not a hemisphere with a single pole—love, on which all his being revolves. If he were, then he would be imperfect. Nay! there are two poles to his nature—justice and mercy: and it is because of these that a zone in which warmth of love is modulated by the severity of justice, so making a climate that is bracing as well as balmy."

Love and Anger.

Therefore, what does God, who requires us to be like himself, enjoin upon us? "Love your enemies?" Yes, and also, "Be ye angry and sin not." And what is the high commendation which he puts upon his Son as he returns victorious from the redemption-battle? "Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity, therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." This combination of opposite attributes is absolutely necessary so long as good and evil are found side by side in the world. For anger is the repulsion of holiness, of truth from error, of light from darkness, of right from wrong. The peril is always upon us that in our weak toleration, we allow these antagonistic elements to become reconciled. Therefore God is very emphatic, saying, "Ye that love the Lord hate evil." God approves a good hater as strongly as he condemns a bad lover. And when sin and false doctrine are courting our favor it will be a high commendation if he may say to us, as he did to the church of Ephesus: "But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans which I also hate."

But I must remind you that the righteous hatred enjoined, discriminates between sin and the sinner. God may punish a sin with his right hand while he offers pardon to the sinner who did it with his left. Indeed I conceive that this is exactly what he does in the work of redemption. On the Cross Christ extends a nail-pierced hand toward God, bearing in it full satisfaction for a broken law, while he reaches down a nail-pierced hand to us, proffering a full forgiveness for our sin. It is just this which gives such strength and security to the believer in Christ. Such an one is not simply forgiven, but he is justified: that is to say judgment and mercy concur in his release from punishment, and both unite in pronouncing him free from condemnation. If you have been forgiven, O believer, it is not that you have been let off on your good behaviour, God's justice reluctantly consenting to the arrangement, with the proviso that on your first offence you may be re-arrested and remanded back to condemnation. No. Ours is a both-handed forgiveness, thank God. Behold the goodness and the severity of God entering into covenant to deliver our souls from death—the goodness that pities and the severity that condemns both satisfied and co-operating in the great transaction. Truly in Christ on the Cross "mercy and truth have met together, righteousness and peace have kissed each other." The tree lends shade to the woodman who cuts it down, says an Oriental proverb. Most true is the saying of that tree on Calvary. They who crucified the Son of God were themselves covered by his Cross. Justice there learned to forgive, and our great sinbearer who looked to the law with its judgments and penalties, and cried, "It is finished," looked also to the sinners, and said, "Father, forgive them."

The slowness and sureness of God's Judgments.

"He is slow to anger and will not acquit the wicked." God does not pay at the end of the week, but he pays at last. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death," says the Scripture. We may be sure, therefore, that when the work of sin is done, the wages of sin will be paid. And yet because God does not declare a dividend every year on investments of wrong-doing, men conclude that there is nothing likely to accrue. The truth is very graphically set forth in the Book of Ecclesiastes: "I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone, in the place of the holy; and he was forgotten in the place where he had done so. Because sentence against an evil work is not speedily executed, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. That is to say, men reason thus: 'Here was my neighbor who was selfish, penurious, and self-indulgent. He went to church every Sunday, but instead of bearing the cross and enduring hardness, as good soldiers of Christ are commanded to do, he had both hands full of the world, and was dissatisfied that he could not get more. And this man lived happily and died easily. I am sure it is that the way things go it does not pay to practice self-denial and to forsake all to follow Christ.' Then fool! Have not you read the Scripture enough to know that this present time is not God's pay-day? And are you so short-sighted as not to understand that because you cannot immediately cut the coupons of blessing from the bonds of self-denial, therefore there is no interest to come to you? O fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have written. 'Ye shall be recompensed at the resurrection of the just,' says Jesus. 'Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me to give to every man according as his work shall be,' he says again. The time of our Lord's return is the day of our reaping and recompense—not now. Miserable proverb of this world it is, that 'a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.' I will let the bird fly out of my hands though its wings be covered with silver, and it is ready to lay me eggs of gold, if I can have the bird in the bush—even the bird of Paradise that sings among the branches of the tree of life which grows by the river of water of life. In other words, I would rather have a heart that sorrows with the sorrowful now, if I may have a heart that can sing with the blessed hereafter. Therefore, let us remember these two things, viz., first: The slowness of God is not slackness. When we see how judgment is perverted in the world: evil crowned, and goodness crucified,

"Right forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne," we cry out in impatience for judgment, saying with the martyrs under the altar: "How long, O Lord, holy and just, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood upon them that dwell upon the earth?" But the calm and reassuring word that breaks upon our ears, as uttered by Peter: "The Lord is not slack concerning his promises as some men count slackness, but to usward, not willing that any man should perish, but that all should come to repentance." "At twelve o'clock," says a father to his disobedient son, "the limit will be reached. If you do not repent and confess your wrong before that hour, the punishment which I have threatened must come upon you." And yet his heart yearns for his boy, and every instinct of parental affection relents from inflicting chastisement. How he holds his eyes away from the clock that he may not see that the fatal hour has come. How he persuades himself that its time is fast, that he may give a few minutes' grace. He even lets the hand slip by a little, hoping that he may hear the longed-for word of penitence. So, my hearers, God lets the dial-hands on the plate of eternity move by, and holds back the bell from striking, that he may yet give space for repentance. Slackness, do you say in your presumption? Nay, it is the slowness of tender compassion—it is the reluctance of fatherly tenderness. He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

Is Long-suffering

And will you make the fact the occasion for provoking him to anger? Shall your feet be only the swifter to run into sin, because his are so slow to overtake you with judgment? And remember that silence is not forgetfulness. That youth who stole out at midnight to commit some wanton sin is encouraged because God seemed to take no notice of his wrong-doing. That clerk who has been pilfering from his employer is emboldened because his plan for concealment has prospered. That respectable man congratulates himself because though practising secret sins he is just as greatly respected as ever. But listen to the warning of the Son of God: "There is nothing hid which shall not be manifested neither is there anything kept secret which shall not come abroad." Turn on the lights, and all that was unseen in the room becomes instantly visible. And when "the Lord shall descend from heaven in flaming fire taking vengeance on all them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" illumination as well as judgment will come, revelation as well as retribution will begin; and next to the terror of punishment, will be the terror of having all our sins laid bare and exposed to the gaze of the whole world. Oh, my hearers, are your sins under the blood?

III. The slowness and swiftness of God's Vindications.

"The Lord is slow to anger, the Lord hath his way in the whirlwind." To this correspond the words of Christ: "And shall not God avenge his own elect which cry day and night unto him?" The whirlwind is not merely a symbol of sudden wrath, but of sudden vindication. Do you not remember how it was with Job? After the miserable prophesying and criticisms of his three friends, in which they added this injury to all his other injuries that of disparaging his character, and showing how richly he had deserved all that had come to him, suddenly we read: "And the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind and said." Then followed that sublime dialogue with the patriarch which ended in his complete vindication and the confounding and rebuking of his sanctimonious friends.

Here is a wonderful lesson for our faith. It is the darkest just before day; and so it is calmest just before a storm. They say that there is a strange and unwonted stillness when a whirlwind or a cyclone is about to break upon the earth. Pray on Christian who hast asked great things of God, knowing that he is able to do great things even exceeding abundantly above all that we are able to ask or think. Instead of being swift to hear and mighty to save it seems as if his ear was closed and the heavens were shut up as brass over your head.

Fear Not.

God hath his way in the whirlwind. Oft-times when the trial of our faith has reached its limit, when a dead calm prevails in which the soul is ready to faint and swoon away into utter hopelessness, the Lord breaks forth in vindication and astonishes us by the greatness of his mercies. Therefore, O Christian, interceding with God for father or mother, for son or daughter—pray on. He is near and not afar off. He shall avenge you speedily. But as sure and swift as our vindication is so sure is our punishment if we are found unprepared for the appearing of our Lord. How swiftly judgment comes at last! "As the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so shall the coming of the Son of man be." O be admonished any of you who are living in unrepented sin! This world has been long confederate against God: sin has become organized and thoroughly compacted, and evil-doers congratulate themselves that they can transgress with impunity. Doth God know? Doth the Almighty see? they ask. Because no immediate retribution comes the evil-doer says that there is no Judge of all the earth, or if there is, that he takes no notice of their conduct. Not so: "For God shall bring every work unto judgment with every secret thing whether it be good or evil," says the Scripture. He has long indeed been silent, and no audible voice has been heard from heaven. Tyrants have shed oceans of blood and he has been silent; the public poisoners have slain their thousands through strong drink, and he has been silent; and the Christian nations have brought ruin and death to millions through their opium traffic, and he has been silent; the betrayers of innocence and the destroyers of virtue have ruined other thousands, and he has been silent. But listen to the words of scripture: "Our God shall come and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him and it shall be very tempestuous around about him." Be afraid therefore, O sinner, to sin and flee from it: be afraid of God and run to his arms.

THE CHAINED PILGRIM.

In the course of a recent missionary address, Dr. Byron A. Woods said: Not long ago, we are told, a man came down to Bombay from Northern India. He was a strange-looking object. On the way down, traveling by train, his transportation was charged for partly as a passenger and partly as freight. The man was a Mohammedan on a pilgrimage to Mecca. Arrived at the steamer, the astonished captain refused to allow him to go on board of his ship. He had loaded himself down with chains, weighing in all six hundred pounds. In the chains were iron pegs and a heavy mallet. These were used in fastening him, when he wished to remain in a particular spot. They asked him the meaning of it all. He replied that when he was a young man he had been exceedingly wicked, but finally had determined to put away his sins. So he put on the first chain. Failing to keep his resolution, he added another, and then another, in the vain effort, until his burden had increased to its present dimensions.

That man represents the thousands to whom our missionaries go. Appetites, habits, passions, customs, sinful hearts and sinful lives—these have made the burden of guilt grow heavier and heavier, until men are bound down, crushed, and destroyed beneath the awful load. To such the missionary goes, in the spirit of his Master, to preach deliverance to captives, and to set at liberty them that are bruised. In our vocabulary, to the sweet and sacred words of "mother" and "home," we add "liberty."

 R. H. Eppert, Coal Bluff, Ind. Who was the mother of David?
 His mother's name is unknown. (See II. Sam. 17: 25.)
 C. E. C. Will vegetables be serviceable for the Food Fund?

Cabbages, potatoes and such vegetables are least liable to perish in the handling would be very acceptable. It is useless, however, to send them from long distances.

Mrs. C. H. Gillam, Oberlin, Kan., writes:
 Allow me to thank those CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who have so kindly and liberally responded to our call for literature. It is impossible to answer them all personally. We now have all the papers arranged for to see us through the present year. A great many have sent us books, those we acknowledge personally.

B. Wing, Lawrenceville, Pa., apropos of the destitution in New York and the suffering among the poor in many places, writes:

Want and woe go hand in hand,
 Sickness and death are o'er the land.
 The cry for bread, the mourners' wail,
 The icy breath of winter's gale.
 Proclaim the darkness of despair;
 And yet the ear of God is near.
 For he who formed the human eye,
 Will he not see and hear the cry?

How long were they in marching through? 5. In what direction did they march from the sea? 6. In what direction did they cross the Jordan, at what place and what is its width at the place of crossing?

1. No; the capital at that time was Thebes-Zoan, Tami or San, as it is now called. It was thirty miles from Goshen, where the Israelites were located. The Israelites set out from the two "treasure cities," Pithom and Rameses. 2. They crossed at Migdol. 3. From shore to shore estimated at about five miles. 4. The best Biblical scholars say that a body of troops could have passed in a few hours, but it probably took the host of the Israelites the greater part of the night. 5. South-south-east. 6. They crossed the river at a point opposite Jericho, proceeding about due west to that city. It is probably a sixteenth of a mile wide at that point.

Subscriber, Black Horse, Pa. If a Christian undertakes to give a tenth of his income to the Lord, can he legitimately reckon as part of the tenth, his pew-rent, the cost of religious books, expenses of going to religious meetings, etc.

When the undertaking to give a tenth was settled by the Christian in question, he should have decided what he meant by giving it to the Lord. There is no law on the subject, binding on Christians. A safe general principle which the individual conscience can apply to all such cases is that what is spent in personal gratification cannot be considered as given to the Lord. The motive has to be taken into account. If the man pays a certain sum as pew-rent, he may do so to secure a comfortable or conspicuous pew, or he may do it to provide support for the pastor. The purchase of religious books, similarly, may be a matter of pride in their possession, or may be for equipment for religious work.

THE NIGHT WANES.

Written for "The Christian Herald."

WATCH! For the night is coming!
 Morn holds her gates ajar;
 Light on the gloom is stealing,
 Watch for the Morning Star.

Wait! Till with golden banners Hung on the glowing sky,
 Gleams with celestial brightness,
 The Dayspring from on high.

Hope! For the working shadows,
 E'en now are on the wing;
 Hope! The Sun of righteousness,
 The Glory-day will bring,

Pray! Lest the wily tempter,
 Woo thee to careless sleep!
 Day must succeed this twilight;
 Yield not, but vigil keep.

Watch for the Lord's appearing!
 Wait for his welcome call!
 Hope for the glorious Rapture!
 Wait for the tempter's fall!

LONGING FOR JESUS' COMING.

"Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." Rev. 22: 20.

DEAR Jesus, we love thee, thou knowest how well,
 We long to be with thee forever to dwell;
 We long to behold thee, thou loved One so fair,
 And in yon bright mansions thy glory to share.

How precious the thought to be parted no more,
 From him we have loved on this sin-stricken shore!
 How strong is the union no power can divide,
 Forever united the Bridegroom and Bride.

Then let us be faithful and watch unto prayer,
 That no one may take our bright crown over there;
 Now don the whole armor of God's blessed Son,
 And live for his glory till life's work is done.

THE SEVENTH TRUMPET.

The Mystery—The Two Women—The Mystic Babylon and its Doom.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE.

THE scene described in the first seven verses of the seventeenth chapter of Revelation does not refer to a literal woman or a literal city. It refers to a symbol full of deep, dark historic significance. It is the symbol of that spiritual power which has been, through all the ages, seducing man from the faith and worship of the one true God; the mystic parent from whom have sprung the false religions, the superstitions, the idolatries which have prevailed in all lands, and by whose active agencies they have been nursed and maintained till this latest time, even in the midst of civilized and evangelized nations.

Of this symbolic character there is distinct intimation in that word—"a mystery"—inscribed on her brow. Now in the spiritual world there are two mysteries. The Bible speaks of both: "the mystery of godliness," and "the mystery of iniquity;" that is, two mighty issues in long and mystic preparation. Out of "the mystery of godliness" there rose, we know, in complete revelation, after being long foreshadowed in type and symbol, the Messiah, God's incarnate Son, "God manifested in the flesh." So, too, out of this—"the mystery of iniquity"—in which, as represented by this Woman and her magic spells, the nations have been educating so long, is to rise at length in full revelation, the Anti-messiah, the Dragon incarnate, Satan manifested in the flesh.

The Woman. Again, in this Book two women are presented in sign and symbol; the one here; the other in the twelfth chapter. There "a great sign" is seen by the prophet "in the Heaven"—a woman; here it is in the wilderness—"the angel carried me away in spirit into the wilderness," and there I saw a woman. Both stand out in magnificent attire. The first in robes celestial; clothed with the Sun, the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars. The second in the flash and splendor of a fallen world, "in purple and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones and pearls." Both are symbolic. The first is God's presentation of the Church of Israel; restored to her covenant position; the mother of the patriarchs, the prophets, the apostles; of this woman, the man child she bears "is caught up to God and to his throne" (12: 1, 5). In contrast to that pure woman is the woman here. This is "the Harlot, having in her hand a cup full of abominations, and unclean things;" the Mistress of all the dark rulers who have headed the world-empire; "the Mother of the abominations of the earth."

Here, then, we have the key. It opens the mystery. It tells that this foul woman is a great symbol, representing in figurative and living form the organized Antichurch of all the ages. Each of these terms employed in describing her has in the Scripture a plain, specific, spiritual signification and usage; and, taken together, they leave no doubt as to what she is, and what she is doing among men. A church, fallen from God into idolatry and superstition and devoting its homage to the worship of demons, is rejected by him and repudiated.

Now "the Woman" of this prediction is the mother of all the superstitious forces, religious ceremonials and dark idolatries, which, in so many kindred forms, have been rooted in all lands; and it is "with the wine fermented and drugged and held to their lips by her and her race of daughters, that all the kindreds of fallen men have been made drunk, and are kept intoxicated and maddened to the end.

This Woman is named Babylon:—that great city which is ruling the kings with a regal sway." And why Babylon? Because this city is the birthplace of the apostasy; the original city in which the rebellion against heaven, inspired by this mystic Seducer, first rose in organized form; and, since then, the source and centre whence have issued all the idolatries, superstitions, abominations, and sacerdotal oppressions by which the kings of the earth have been swayed and the nations enslaved.

It is a mistake to suppose that idolatrous and demon worship was gradual in its emergence; a religious evolution; the effort of men striving after God. Its rise was sudden; its birth gigantic; conceived in deliberate rebellion; the invention of a proud ambition at war with God, and intended to displace and counteract his will.

SYSTEMATIC BENEFICENCE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing March 11, Mat. 3: 7-12.

PAUL'S direction to the Corinthian Christians supplies the rule of conduct to be observed in this matter of giving. They were to lay by them in store, as God had prospered them. The proportion of gifts to income was not fixed, but the amount of the gift was clearly to be proportioned to the income. This proportion, therefore, every Christian should fix for himself. His gifts should not be spasmodic, or impulsive, but well-considered and deliberate. The Lord's money should be a sacred trust, provided for and intelligently expended. It ought to be set apart, so that the giver sees that it really is expended; for it often happens that a man does not give, in the course of a year, so much as he thinks he gives. This deliberate provision, also, has the advantage of furnishing an opportunity for classifying the gifts. Obviously, the various branches of the Lord's work are entitled to a share. There are times when one branch is in greater need than another. In some years, the claim of the Lord's poor, or of Foreign Missions, or of denominational support, may be more urgent than other claims and this fact should be taken into account. It is a stewardship and should be exercised with discrimination. As to the amount to be laid aside, conscience should dictate. The Jewish proportion of a tenth is not obligatory, although the Christian would be strangely oblivious of his higher privileges and blessings if under ordinary circumstances he gave less. No man ought to give so lavishly that he incapacitates himself for paying his just debts. The very first idea of such a store as the Lord's money presupposes that the giver is living within his income; otherwise he may be laying aside money that does not belong to him, but to his creditors. With such a gift we may be sure God is not pleased. It is the gift which is the result of self-denial that is most acceptable. The man who will give up some expensive habit, who will deny himself some luxury that he may lay upon the altar the money he would have spent on it, is the man whose gift is valued. Whether the money so saved is given to the poor, or to the Lord's work, the giver is blessed in his soul by the act. It has cost him something and he is drawn heavenward by the gift.

It is remarkable how often liberal givers are blessed of God. He endows with greater means of giving those who can be trusted to do good with their means. Luther used to tell a story in illustration. He said there was in Austria a monastery noted for its gifts to the poor. The monastery prospered and was famous for its wealth. But the monks began to hoard the money, instead of giving it to the poor. Soon the monastery became poor. One day a saint, in the guise of a mendicant, went to the monastery and asked for alms. The monks told him they had none to give. "Do you know why the treasury is empty?" he asked. The monks gave several reasons. "None of these is the real reason," said the saint. "You once had two brothers in your monastery named Date and Dabitur. You thrust out Date and then, when Dabitur felt lonely without his brother, he left of his own accord." The monks protested that they had never had such inmates. "Have you forgotten your Latin, too?" asked the saint. "Date means give and Dabitur, it shall be given to you. When Date is again an inmate of your house, Dabitur will return and your treasury will no longer be empty."

EPWORTH LEAGUE NOTES.

A conference of Northern and Southern Leagues was held recently at St. Louis in the Union Church. The subjects considered were: "The Condition of the Suffering Poor;" "The Responsibility of the Individual for his Share of the Lord's Work;" and "The Best Method of Conducting the Social and Literary Department." As a result of the consideration of the first subject, a substantial sum was added to the treasury of the Young People's Relief Society. At no time has the help of the Leagues been more efficient than in the revival services of this winter. The first company of Epworth League Guards in Colorado has been formed in connection with the Grant Avenue Church of Denver. The church has a flourishing Junior League, and the idea of the Guards has been welcomed with enthusiasm. A novel feature of League work which would interest Chapters in other cities has been adopted at Cleveland, O. One member has been appointed editor of a Chapter magazine. It is his duty to obtain short literary articles from other members, these, there were old books and many other interesting articles. Short talks about each of the exhibits made up a most enjoyable evening's entertainment.

THE BAPTIST BOYS' BRIGADE.

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 31, was published an account of the organization of the Baptist Boys' Brigade, of which about one hundred and fifty companies have been formed. We are now enabled to publish a picture, taken from a photograph of a group of officers of the First Regiment of the Brigade. The uniforms and accoutrements are a distinct attraction to the boys and, as we learn from Rev. W.R. Deming, who is at the head of the movement, the number of new companies is growing rapidly. On Feb. 22, grand reviews were held in Boston, Brooklyn and New York. The New York boys were delighted with the honor of an address from the distinguished veteran, Gen. O. O. Howard, who reviewed the regiments. Mr. Deming writes: "Those who doubt the wisdom of this work are chiefly those who have never engaged in it, and are not really acquainted with it. We have yet to find a single pastor who has organized a company according to the directions laid down in the Manual and been disappointed in the result. Many of our correspondents in different parts of the country have asked if there were any organization of the Baptist Boys' Brigade for that he was not setting his children a proper example overcame him, and before the sermon he rose and said, 'Pray for me that I may be a Christian, and a true father to my boys.' The result was that last Sunday he, with his wife and two sons, was baptized. Again it is true that 'a little child may lead them.'"

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Endeavorers at Aston, a suburb of Birmingham, England, lately gave a poor children's treat, when about two hundred children were present.

Mr. Stanley Newcombe, secretary of the Auckland Provincial Union of New Zealand, writes, that on Sept. 30 there were thirty-two societies of Christian Endeavor in the Union.

The Building Fund of the Philadelphia Women's Christian Association has reached $19,000. The Association has met with many reverses, but seems now to be on the high road to prosperity.

Subscribers who have written us asking instructions as to the formation of Christian Endeavor Societies should address Mr. William Shaw, 645 Washington street, Boston, Mass., from whom they can obtain badges, pledge-cards and all appliances.

The Melbourne Young Women's Christian Association has been celebrating its eleventh anniversary. The secretary says: "For the Y.W.C.A. these have been happy and busy years. The Lord has blessed the work abundantly, and has crowned it with his rich blessing. The new building is a monument of answered prayer."

The Damascus and Jerusalem Young Men's Christian Associations send very encouraging accounts of their work. At Cairo and Alexandria the branches have an excellent sphere for service, but are limited in their operations by the need in each case of an officer who could give his whole time to the work. The Damascus Association has fifty-three active members.

During the past year, sixteen members of the Foreign Missionary Society in connection with the Glasgow Young Men's Christian Association have gone abroad to different parts of the world, but special interest attaches to the departure of Mr. Gilbert Ritchie, who is to be supported by the Glasgow Association, in connection with the China Inland Mission.

Mrs. J. P. Burkholder, of the Free Baptist Mission to the Santals, writes: "We live in the jungles of India among the Santals, who are supposed to be one of the aboriginal tribes of the country. This year we have organized a Christian Endeavor Society among our young people, and also a Junior Society for the children. Both are well attended. The people are very poor; but we hope with our Father's help, to train up a good band of workers."

The Epworth League Annual for 1894 is just out. It includes prayer-meeting topics for the entire year, Junior prayer-meeting topics, benevolences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, official publications, important dates in Methodism, a brief account of the organization of the League, and the newest and completest available Epworth League statistics.

A lady at Bozeman, Mont., writes to the "Epworth Herald" that an organization has been formed there similar to the one at Ravenswood, Ill., recently described in these columns. She says: We have in Bozeman an Epworth League and three Endeavor Societies—Presbyterian, Baptist, and Campbellite. All these hold monthly united meetings under the name of "The Christian Union of Young People."

Notice to Church Societies.

A new and easy plan for raising Money, Books, Carpets, etc., for Churches, Sunday Schools and Parsonages is offered by the Consumers' Wholesale Tea & Spice Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio. Churches in need should write them for particulars; also ladies who would like to secure beautiful premiums for themselves.

to edit and arrange them, and have the whole neatly type-written for reading on a stated evening once a month. The articles need not be exclusively on League topics, but are expected to be of a moral or religious character. After the magazine has been read at the meeting it is deposited in the library, and is called for quite as often as books by eminent writers. A correspondent of the "Epworth Herald" at Ellsworth, Kan., describes an interesting social which was recently held by the League in that town. It was held in response to the call for the exhibition of souvenirs and resulted in the production of more of these articles than anyone supposed were in existence in the town. One member exhibited two Indian arrows which had been shot at him by Nebraska Indians. Another had a package of fused nails which he had picked up among the debris of the great Chicago fire. A third had an autograph letter from Abraham Lincoln. A war veteran exhibited a china cup which he carried with him all through the war. Another relic was a china bowl once used by John Wesley. Besides the United States. There is none as yet, because organization implies concerted action. The Baptist Boys' Brigade movement is only a year old, and is growing so rapidly that no such action has been possible, except in localities.

Dr. R. B. Hull of the Greenwood Baptist Church, Brooklyn, has devoted much attention to the Brigade connected with his church and has been gratified by seeing distinct spiritual results from it. In a letter to the "Examiner," he says: "The influence of the Boys' Brigade was effectively shown last Sunday in the Greenwood Church. A member of the Brigade was converted at the summer camp—Camp Holly. His brother was converted in the Brigade prayer-meetings in the church. The committee appointed to visit the boys at their home talked faithfully with their mother. She gave herself to the Lord, and asked the two brethren to speak to her husband. They did so. At first he gave no sign of yielding to the truth. He attended the church services, however, and as he saw the Brigade with his boys march into the church the thought

A Syrian Baby.

Our Traveler describes Child-life in the East—A Rough Infancy.

IN a former paper I described a home in which I found one Syrian girl-baby, and the housekeeping which went on about her. The object of my present visit being to see another, I had eyes for little else until I had inspected her immediate surroundings and learned all there was to hear of her little life.

Three months before our call the news that a birth was impending drew about the one-roomed hut in which parents and three children already lived, a crowd of friendly neighbors. Outside, the men smoked and talked with the father to while away the period of suspense. Within, their wives thronged the chamber to suffocation, also, smoking and talking, all at once. The mother lay upon a mat at the far side of the floor, with just enough room between her and the wall to allow the passage of the loudly-officious matrons who hovered about her.

Dr. William G. Schauffler, the beloved physician to many natives in Beirut, once told me how he had charged into the midst of such a rabble, upon being called to take charge of "a dangerous case."

"There were fifty women in a twelve-by-twelve room," he said. "The air was stifling; the hubbub indescribable. I wasted no words. Two strong sentences in Arabic, with gestures to match, sent them scurrying to the door, and I could at least see the patient."

When the sex of our particular baby was reluctantly announced, there was a general falling away of solicitous friends. A dead silence followed the unwelcome phrase—accentuated, presently, by the groans of the nearest of feminine kindred and the sobs of the poor mother. The men emptied their pipes upon the ground and stalked off, mercifully forbearing to look at the father, disgraced by the appearance of still another daughter.

The women departed in like manner, without speaking to him, or to his wife. Often the husband approaches the mat upon which the unhappy woman is left alone with her new-born child, and scolds her vehemently for the disappointment she has caused him. Sometimes he actually strikes her in his fury. My guide told me of one instance that had come under his personal observation in which the mother had beaten her head and breast with her fists in a frenzied attempt to commit suicide. Life under the shame that had come to her was insupportable.

Had our baby been a boy, a turmoil of congratulations would have ensued upon the proclamation at the door of the hut. The happy father would have been embraced with tears of joy by his comrades, drums would have been beaten and trumpets blown, and such humble gifts as the poor can make to one another been sent in to the mother, already overwhelmed by the caresses and praises of her gossips.

The little intruder upon a domestic circle and community thus organized had had few visitors and no presents when we made our call.

"I wish," said an indignant woman-missionary, who has labored in the East for thirty-odd years, "that not another girl would be born to you Syrians for half a century, that you might know the real value of women in the world!"

The cradle of roughly-cut, unpainted wood stood in the middle of the floor. Upon slats nailed over the tall rockers was tacked a mattress stuffed with straw. Directly upon this, the child, clad in a single calico garment, was strapped by means of strips of cotton cloth, six inches in width, attached to the framework of the cradle. The only pillow was placed exactly beneath the shoulder-blades, the head sagging forlornly upon the lower level of the mattress. The baby's arms were laid close to its sides, its legs were stretched as straight as though the bed were its coffin; a sort of "duvet"

It stopped whining when she lifted it to display the construction of the cradle and the mysteries of the long strips of cloth, depositing the late occupant upon the mat beside her. The brown legs were kicked eagerly into the air, the arms tossed wildly in true baby-style, and the gurgling coo which is the natural language of infantile humanity the world around, testified to its relief and pleasure. A four-year-old sister laughed gleefully in reply, and grabbing the baby, hitched it up to her hip in Syrian fashion; the tiny head wobbling frightfully.

"She will surely drop it!" gasped I, with a glance at the pitiless floor, a concrete of clay and stones.

The mother smiled; the interpreter reassured me.

"Oh! the older children carry the babies—when they are carried—from their birth, even when just able to toddle about themselves. She has probably had that little one in her arms four or five times a day, ever since it was born. The boys never touch them of course. The girls are burden-bearers from the first."

The baby's head was already one-sided, the soft skull yielding readily to the pressure of the straw mattress. For twenty hours out of twenty-four it is bound down in the way I have described, and as the mother always kneels on the right-hand side of the cradle to nurse it, the head is habitually turned in that direction.

While talking, the mother—a Druse—squatted upon the bare floor, having laid cushions for us. She was comely with her black eyes, white teeth and ready smile. Her dress consisted of pink calico trousers, very wide and full, a short jacket of the same material, of a deeper red, and a veil of coarse white cotton, pinned tightly around her forehead and falling down her back. The sale of red calico of every conceivable shade, must be immense in this country, almost as large as that of blue cloth of which the men's jackets and trousers are made. While we chatted of the baby, a third was brought upon the scene, of course in the arms of an older sister. Few of the babies I have seen are plump, and fewer are robust with the rollicking elasticity of muscle and joints manifest in healthy American babies. Yet the much-described "state of artificial civilization" is as far removed from them as if they were creatures of a different genus from our rosy, well-fed darlings. Those who advocate bringing up children in absolute obedience to natural laws and instincts, would have few suggestions to offer to the Syrian mother, except in the matter of binding her baby in the cradle. As soon as he can creep, he is tossed upon the bosom of Mother Earth, and left to "hustle" for himself among his fellows. When drowsy, he crawls into a corner and goes to sleep like a little brown dog; if hungry, he eats whatever comes within reach of his dirty hands that commends itself to his judgment as possibly eatable. At night, he huddles down in the one garment he has worn all day, close to brothers and sisters, to gain warmth through the sunless hours from their bodies.

When his mother is in a good humor she strokes and pats him and flings a fig or morsel of sweet cake to him; when she is busy, she kicks him out of her path; when angry—and this is often with the ignorant, untrained woman who was married at twelve years of age—she takes a stick to him and swears volubly, cursing the day in which he was born and invoking the vengeance of heaven upon his undutiful soul. The immature soul that is in this state of nature and natural development, gets even less washing than his body.

"How clean your baby looks!" said my guide to the mother of still another baby.

It was a boy, and almost the only infant we had seen whose skin was clear, and whose hair had the appearance of growing upon a healthy scalp. The proud parent showed her white teeth in a gleam of childish gratification.

"Yes! He should be clean. He had his first bath to-day. He is four months old, quite old enough to be taken to the baths."

The home washing is an unknown luxury. Four times in a year, parents and children treat themselves to a plunge at the public baths, where a cleansing can be had for an absurdly small sum. For three months thereafter, soap and towels, comb and brush—belonging to the "state of artificial civilization"—have no place in the unsophisticated household. While we still sat about the swinging cradle, the rush of naked feet was heard, and three little girls from five to ten years of age, halted upon the threshold, at sight of the clean new matting the mother had unrolled at our entrance, and one after the other, stepped into an earthen bowl of dirty water standing outside; dabbled their toes in it, rubbed one bare foot hastily over the other and entered. They left wet tracks upon the uncovered strip of concrete flooring, and muddy marks upon the "company" matting, but complacent in the conviction that they had done all which decency and etiquette demanded, they tucked their dripping feet under them, and composed themselves to get their share of the enjoyment of our visit. Of the unmarried girl of Northern Syria and Palestine I will talk at some future day. MARION HARLAND, or quilt—was spread above it, and over all the straps were passed, smooth and level, under the slats and up again on the other side to be tied with tape strings to a rude framework above the head of the tiny mummy. She could not stir finger or foot, or roll over by so much as a quarter-inch of space. When she cried, the mother knelt upon the floor and nursed her.

"She does not like it—no!" she answered, smiling at the query whether or not the baby relished the strapping process.

Nevertheless, whenever the small prisoner cries, it is assumed that she is hungry and whatever the mother is doing, she leaves everything to feed her. The custom of regular meal-time practised by most intelligent mothers and nurses in America and England is considered barbarous.

"But it may be that the mothers in those countries do not pity the poor little things, as we do?" said our hostess, tentative, but courteous, as she responded for the third time within half-an-hour to her nursing's fretful appeal.

"There is hardly one well-shaped skull among the hundreds of Syrian boys and men in our preparatory school and college," said one of the Beirut professors to me. "They are all flattened at the back, or on the side, before the first year of infancy is over. They wear the fez indoors and out. When it is removed the deformity is seen."

If the effect of the much-dreaded evil eye be, as is supposed, a mysterious wasting away of flesh and loss of vigor, some former visitor may have exercised it upon the wee creature in the swinging cot. She was so fragile in frame, so ethereal in her pale prettiness that I asked out of the fullness of common-sense experience and observation, upon what diet she was fed.

"She is not yet weaned," was the unexpected answer, "but she eats anything, potatoes, garlic, radishes, green almonds, cucumbers, bananas, cactus-figs"—the fruit of the wild prickly pear that flourishes rankly everywhere—"everything in fact, that grown people like. Why not? she has twelve teeth."

MARIE'S very features were altering into premature sedateness; she was alternately petulant and moodily reserved when she was not feverishly gay, and as the weeks wore on, had an air of nervous expectancy unaccounted for by any clue of information, or of suspicion at the mother's command, until Elspeth offered one.

"The bairnie is mayhap fretting for her father," she felt constrained to say to her mistress, lest she might discover the secret by other and less gentle means. "His name never passes her lips, and I'm thinking that's a sign she thinks of him the mair."

Marie was in her third-story room where she spent at least two-thirds of her time when she was at home. The door was locked. Elspeth could have told her how common an occurrence this was, but her mother was surprised when her knock was answered by the turn of the key.

"Why do you lock yourself in, my love?" she asked. "I hope the children do not annoy you by running in and out? I have charged them not to disturb you when you are busy with your studies."

"O, no! they are good little things, and never come unless they are called. But it is cosier to sit on the right side of a locked door."

The flippant tone and studied indifference of behavior continued while her mother unfolded the particulars of the news she had brought, until, out of the fullness of her gratitude, she dwelt upon her brother's generosity.

He intends, he says, to put the house in perfect repair, to have a furnace built in the cellar, and a bath-room in the second story, and hot and cold water throughout the house. All this, he would have me believe, is not contingent upon our removal to Pequod, but I know better. There will not be another dwelling in the region so luxuriously appointed. That is Uncle Roger's way. He dreads being thanked as much as ever Mr. Jarndyce could have dreaded acknowledgments. I anticipate your scruples in this matter, my darling. You feel with me, that we are already under such heavy obligations to your uncle—surely the noblest, tenderest counsellor ever given to a woman in the hour of need!—that you hesitate to make further drafts upon his goodness."

Marie smiled sarcastically.

"On the contrary, mother, I have no scruples on that score. You have read me wrong, for once. Uncle Roger is a pattern of truthfulness, as of liberality. When he declares that he is spending some thousands of the money he does not know what to do with, upon a new toy for his own personal gratification, without a thought of pauperizing us, we are bound to believe him. As to our share in his project, I cannot understand why you should go through the form of consulting me. While I am a minor and dependent upon you—and Uncle Roger—I am at your disposal, to come or to go, or to starve, as you shall decide. One place is as good as another to me, since we cannot go back to New York to live. I cannot dislike this country place with an Indian name more than I dislike Brooklyn. I suppose we cannot go into society anywhere. So—what difference does it make what I say or think, or feel, when you and Elspeth and Uncle Roger are adequate to manage everything?"

"You misjudge me and your uncle," returned Mrs. Paull with no sign of the cruel pain this reception of her story had cost her. "If I did not believe that your health would be improved by the removal to higher, drier air, and by the out-door life you could enjoy in Pequod, all the other considerations you have named would have no weight with me. As to my advisers, we will leave our faithful Elspeth out of the question entirely. She does not deserve to be introduced into such a connection. While I depend upon your uncle in business affairs, as he has given me abundant reason for doing, I am strong enough to trust to my own judgment in whatever concerns my children and my home and theirs. You ought not to require me to assure you of that."

Marie was cold and still; her eyes were downcast, her lips were a straight, stubborn line.

The mother's voice changed from argument to entreaty.

"What has come between us lately, my daughter? We used to be such dear and intimate friends who believed in each other's affection and trusted each other's motives. What have I done to grieve or to alienate you?"

Another long, dumb interval, growing more oppressive as the seconds ticked themselves into minutes upon the tiny clock upon the desk. Marie had wheeled her chair around to receive her mother, and sat under her father's portrait. The tear-vase with its spray of purple heliotrope was in its place, lightly perfuming the air of the room. A pale purple scarf of soft silk, given to Marie at Christmas, was knotted across one corner of the gilded frame.

Suddenly the girl raised her eyes abruptly, light in them that confounded her companion as they blazed into hers, then passed to the portrait hanging between them.

The handsome, sunny face with the crowning curls, and golden chestnut mustache and half-smile of content with himself and good will toward his fellow-men that won his way everywhere. The lover of Alice Lanier's gloriously happy girlhood, the husband she had idolized—now the banned refugee from her, and home, and native land!

Without the utterance of a syllable, the daughter arraigned one parent for irreparable wrong done to the other.

"You affect ignorance of your offence against me!" said feature and gesture. "Can you answer to me, his child and yours, for what you have done to him?"

For an instant Mrs. Paull was deathly white; her features were sharpened, and the dull, hopeless misery was again in her eyes. The next, she rallied her native powers, and her glance followed Marie's to the pictured face.

"I will not pretend to misunderstand you, although I could have wished that the charge had been brought out in a different way. You would accuse me of injustice to your father, and unkindness to you, because I do not talk of him to you and the children, or give you any news of him. Perhaps I have erred in my silence. My brother thinks so. Had I been led as blindly by him as you intimate, you would have had the whole story before this. But I hoped that you had faith in your mother's love. I wished to spare you pain—and there are things which it is not easy for me to say to any one. Your father loved you very dearly."

"If it gives you pain to tell me that, you may leave it unsaid!" interrupted harsh, husky accents. "I know it better—a thousand times better than you can ever tell me. He said to me—and I would believe him in opposition to all the canting uncles in Christendom—he said the last time I saw him, that I was the dearest thing to him on earth or in heaven. How that would shock Uncle Roger! I never told you—I shall never tell your brother that my father came to see me that Thursday evening and said 'Good-bye' to me. He expected then to go to New Orleans the next day on business—business that worried him exceedingly. He took me in his arms and kissed me twenty times, and asked me never to believe anything his enemies might bring up against him when he was not here to defend himself. He had battled a long time with them, he said, and they might get the better of him for a while, but I was never to doubt his innocence or his love for me, never! never!"

Her vehemence did not lessen the fond compassion with which her mother looked at her defiant face.

"You say that this was on Thursday? the 21st of November?"

"It was. I came home on Saturday, my heart so full of grief and wonder that I would have rushed up to tell you all, and cry myself quiet in your arms, and found you ill."

"He said that he was setting out for New Orleans?"

"He did. He was dressed for traveling then."

"Yet his passage was already taken for Havre! Have you ever thought to compare statement and fact?"

"No. I had his word, which was absolute truth to me. Something unforeseen changed his plans. I suppose you know what. His passage must—it was taken after he saw me. He said—oh, so sadly, mamma!—that you often misjudged him, and undervalued his love; that the day would come when you would see that you were mistaken, and, maybe, regret the devotion you had thrown away. He longed to know that he had the love of one true heart, and so came to me; I would never desert him. I promised solemnly, my arms about his neck, his dear cheek (there were tears on it, mamma!) against mine, that I would always love him and believe in him, and no cunning slanders that other people may persuade you into crediting will ever make me break my word. If he were to send for me to-morrow to come to him at the ends of the earth, I would go, if I had to steal the money to take me there. I would rather starve with him than live in luxury upon Uncle Roger's money!" cried the child, terrible, dry sobs breaking up the torrent of confession.

She sat erect, her fingers interlocked upon the desk, and talked fast; blood and brain at fever-heat.

"My poor, loyal darling!" with tears running down her own cheeks, Mrs. Paull would have drawn herself to her, but she eluded the embrace by setting her chair further away. "My love! do you imagine that what you have said can make your mother love you less? If anything could draw a man to his home and hold him there, it would be such devotion and such faith as yours. Wherever your father may be—and, Marie! you must believe me when I say that I have not had one line from him since he wrote to your uncle on the day he sailed from America, saying that he was obliged by business misfortunes to go abroad,—wherever and whatever he may be—"

"He is the purest and noblest of men, always and everywhere!"

"I do not contradict it, dear. I was about to say that I hope and pray he may always remember how his daughter loves him. For myself, I have no complaint to make in his children's ears. I have insisted upon this to your uncle—"

"My uncle!" broke in Marie, fiercely. "My uncle who is rich enough to rectify any 'business misfortunes' my father could have met with, without feeling it, the purse-proud Pharisee who cheats him out of the first place in his wife's affections—"

"My daughter!"

"I mean it—every word of it! And drives him out of the country that he may the better blacken his good name. The high-bred gentleman who stoops to gossip with sympathizing servant-women over the ruin he has caused. Oh, how I loathe that man's very name, and his sneering smile and plausible lies!"

"Marie! shame!"

She raved on.

"Shame! yes! to him for saying such things, and to Elspeth for listening to him, and to you for not turning both of them out of your house, instead of believing their horrible slanders! No, mother! you have complained of my reserve, and I shall leave you without excuse for finding any such fault again with me. I am a Paull, through and through, and there is no hypocrisy in that strain. If I knew in what vein of mine runs the Lanier blood, I would cut it this minute, and let the false black drops out—here, before the blessed angel's picture! It would be a sweet savor in his nostrils if he could know that I had done it!"

She laughed wildly, as the listener, aghast, raised her hands imploringly. There was unholy triumph in the mirth. In the defenceless woman before her she saw the impetuousness of the evil influences that had ruined and exiled her father.

"Don't stare and gasp as if you believed me crazy! I have my father's head and I can think out things without Mr. Roger Lanier's assistance. I know just how it all happened. My father, always generous and trusting to his own hurt—wanted to borrow money of his rich brother-in-law, who had prevailed upon his father (and yours) to leave all your property in your dear brother's hands, and the immaculate Roger would not lend him a dollar, although aware how cruelly crippled were his finances, and hunted him into exile. Or, perhaps he was obliged to go away from unmerciful creditors, and when he was gone, Mr. Millionaire Lanier, to cover up his own crooked dealings and inhumanity, fabricated a story which I would not believe if all the Laniers who ever lived were to swear to it on a pile of Bibles as high as the Brooklyn Bridge!"

"God give me patience!" murmured the unhappy mother, rising so feebly that had not her child been half-frenzied, she must have been moved to pity.

Instead, the perverse devil that was driving her onward prompted a final thrust. She became all at once, apparently as cool as she had been hot.

"So, you see, mother," also rising, and assuming a judicial air that pierced the wife with a new sense of familiarity, so faithfully was it copied from her father—"you are wasting your time and strength in trying to bring me around to my dear relative's ways of thinking in anything. If he has set his heart upon hiding his poor relations in the country where they will not disgrace him and his fine-lady wife, why he will do it. Where is the use of my opposing him? On the side of the oppressor there is power. I am amazed at discovering that he has a vulnerable place left in his conscience, and can be made uncomfortable by the sight of his victims. I am glad that my face reminds him of the man he has injured."

"We need never go all over this ground again, mother, now that we have it all out. By all means, let Uncle Roger salve his conscience with furnaces and water-works, and all the other luxuries he may choose to put into his farm-house. Unless my father should send for me, or gives me other orders, I must, for propriety's sake, live in your house until I can support myself, which will be in a couple of years at the farthest. I had a talk with Mrs. Marcy yesterday in which she promised that she would make a place for me in the primary department by the time I am graduated."

There are but two classes of beings in civilized society whom one may maltreat with a refinement of barbarity, without fear of reprisals. These are mothers and wives. Ernest Paull had discovered for himself this cardinal truth. The instinct of heredity had revealed it to his daughter, and his teachings emboldened her to avail herself of it. When anger had burned down, she could create sparkles among the ashes by reminding herself that he was partially avenged.

Decidedly, Alice Paull had enough pressing upon her shoulders and spirit to drive her into her grave, or into a mad-house by April fifteenth, the day on which she turned the key for the last time in No. 363 Mendebras avenue, and departed with Elspeth and the two boys—Gladys being left with Mrs. Lanier—to unpack and settle her household goods in the rambling homestead, red-brick in front and back, rough, hewn stone at the gable ends, upon the western bank of Pequod Lake.

Marie's vacation had begun a week before the long walk that stranded her upon the church-steps.

Elspeth would have it that she had studied herself pale and thin, and built many hopes upon the system of feeding and general bracing that must go into effect, now, that books were laid aside for two months and a half. The "puir bairnie" must walk, row and drive abroad in air which the Highland-born woman sniffed eagerly as "a maist as sweet and strang" as that of her native heaths. Accordingly, errands were manufactured for her by the score. There were wild strawberries to be gathered wild flowers to be transplanted into the garden, and fish to be caught for the table. Mrs. Paull had found in the stable upon her arrival, a stout roadster, young enough to be lively, and good looking and old enough to be well-broken and safe, and a neat, light carriage and after Marie's arrival, she was elected charioteer-in-chief.

She listened with a smile—always joyless, sometimes sadder than tears, to the various schemes for luring back light and color to her thin face. She was willing to try them all, she said, obediently, but proposed none of her own accord, with a single exception.

THE SWEETEST LIVES.
THE sweetest lives are those to duty wed
Whose deeds both great and small,
Are close knit strands of an unbroken thread
Where love ennobles all.
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells,
The Book of Life the shining record tells.

Thy love shall chant its own beatitudes
After its own life-working. A child's kiss Set on thy sighing lips shall make thee glad;
A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich;
A sick man helped by thee shall make thee strong;
Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense
Of service which thou renderest.

Scrofulous Bunches
Neck Lanced Without Relief
Hood's Sarsaparilla Purifies the Blood and Conquers.
"I had large scrofulous bunches on my neck for seven years: I treated with different physicians and tried many remedies but

A SLANDERER REBUKED.

A certain minister, was anxious to show a lady in his congregation the evil of slander. So he asked her to go to market, buy a chicken just killed and still covered with feathers, and walk a certain distance, plucking the bird as she went. The lady did as she was directed, and then returned, "Re-trace your steps," said the minister, "and gather up, one by one, all the feathers you have scattered." "I cast the feathers carelessly away," said the woman, "and the wind carried them in all directions." "Well, my daughter," the minister replied, "so it is with your words of slander; like the feathers which the wind has scattered, they have been wafted in many directions. Call them back, now, if you can. Go, sin no more."

GOD'S PROVIDENCE.
WE little know
How sparrows grow
And live through winter's ice and snow;
Yet they get through Storms, rain and dew
And live and sing till roses blow.

'Tis God's great love,
Beneath, above;
Life, light and scene of joy must give—
The sparrows heard
The gracious word,
Sing! little birds, and eat and life.

The Yellow Jessamine.

Almost everyone has either read or heard of the famous Southern Yellow Jessamine—a pot grown plant of which is here shown. Tourists go into ecstasies over it, and carefully press sprays of the exquisite blooms to carry to their Northern homes as mementoes of a Winter spent in "The Land of Flowers." There is not an easier grown or more beautiful climber in cultivation, either for the window, or for the open ground, succeeding in almost any soil or situation. It is quick growing, has beautiful shining evergreen foliage, and completely loads itself with its beautiful golden-yellow, exquisitely sweet-scented funnel-shaped flowers, containing near 40 buds and open flowers. A well-grown vine in full bloom is a sight never to be forgotten, and beyond the power of pen to describe. As a trellis plant for the window, nothing can be more desirable, as it flowers in February and March—when flowers are so scarce—begins blooming while very young and is always ornamental. Fine pot-grown plants, sure to live and grow off rapidly, only 15c. each. Amaryllis Equestris. One of the most beautiful and easiest grown Amaryllis in cultivation. Flowers five inches across, bright, sparkling orange-red, with a most beautiful green and white star in the centre. Potted now will flower at Easter. Bulbs 15c. each. Australian Silk Oak (Grevillea robusta), a splendid Fern-leaved pot shrub, beautiful as a Fern, stately as a Palm, and endures drought, heat, gas, and dust equally as well as the Rubber Plant. You can grow nothing more striking and graceful. Fine pot-grown plants, 15c. each. Russelia Juncea, a lovely pot or basket plant, covered almost the year round with masses of tubular, bright scarlet flowers like coral drops. 15c. each. Special Offer. All of the above, amounting to one, and a Free Gift of a Cattleya Guava plant, carefully wrapped in long strands of the beautiful Spanish Moss or Cray Beard which is so fine for decorating rooms, to hang over pictures, etc., and mailed to any address for only 50c., and safe delivery guaranteed.

Beautiful Shells from the Gulf of Mexico. These shells we have collected from beneath the shadow of the Light House on Egmont Key, an island off the west coast of Florida. It is not generally known that there lie buried on this Key about 100 Union soldiers of the late war, and an almost impenetrable thicket has grown up over their graves. The shells embrace all the varied forms and exquisite beauties for which these "gems of the ocean bed" are noted, and are beautiful for shell work or mantle ornaments, and exceedingly interesting additions to cabinet collections of "curios" or "specimens." We will send a wide variety of shapes and sizes, postpaid, at the following prices: 6 for 20c., 15 for 40c., 25 for 60c., 50 for $1.00.

Our Catalogue of Rare Florida Flowers and Fruits for '94, contains 64 pages, elegant colored plate, department of Florida Curios, quantities of fine illustrations, etc., tells all about everything offered in this advertisement and hundreds of other choice plants, all offered at "hard times prices." Also tells how we are able to offer plants at such low prices. Copy sent Free with every order, and also to every one asking for it. Don't buy elsewhere until you see it, for we will save you money.

The Washington Revival.

The Wonderful Work now in Progress under the Leadership of Messrs. Moody and Sankey in the National Capital.

NEVER before in its history, has the National Capital witnessed scenes of religious enthusiasm, so general or so profound, as those in the Moody and Sankey campaign, which commenced on February 7. From the first meeting to the present time, the vast auditorium has been crowded with eager audiences every time its doors have been opened, and thousands have been unable to gain admission, while the overflow meetings at the Mt. Vernon M. E. Church and the Assembly Presbyterian Church have also been thronged. The Washington "Post" at the end of the second week of the meetings, evidently puzzled by the phenomenon of the enormous numbers who, day after day and night after night, in the most unfavorable weather, struggled to get into the building, tried to analyze the situation to discover the cause. It declared that the attraction could not be Mr. Moody's preaching, for many preachers more eloquent than he might be heard on any Sunday in the city. It could not be Mr. Sankey's almost supernatural sweetness of song, for other world-famed singers had never drawn crowds so great. "There must therefore," it says, "be something else besides Moody and Sankey and the massed hundreds of chorus which impels the men and women of Washington to hurry through with their dinners every evening and rush pell-mell toward Convention Hall, and if one could look down into their souls they would be found full of the strange fervor that men call by different names. Some call it fanatical excitement; others deprecate it under the name of religious insanity; in heaven the angels sing about it and call it the grace of God."

The meetings are held in the great Convention Hall, a picture of which appears on this page. It stands on Third Street, between K and L Streets, is one hundred by three hundred feet, and is lighted by a thousand electric lamps. It has 4,000 numbered seats, every one of which is filled at each meeting and every available inch of standing ground is occupied, the patience and energy of the ushers being taxed to keep the aisles clear. Four weeks before the arrival of the Evangelists preparations for their coming were begun. Every Evangelical Church in the city was interested in the movement. Committees were formed covering all points of organization and it is noteworthy, as showing the fundamental unity of the churches underlying their differing names and creeds, that no less than forty-five congregations were represented on these Committees. The choir under the leadership of Mr. Percy

MR. DWIGHT L. MOODY

MR. IRA D. SANKEY.

S. Foster is, Mr. Sankey says, the largest and best the Evangelists have ever had either here or in England. It has eighteen hundred trained voices to draw upon and at and on the first night, finding that the vast audience was content to listen, he asked the choir to be silent during the singing of one hymn, in order that the people might find the volume of sound. But it is to Mr. Sankey's wonderful solos that the people listen with the greatest delight. With his head thrown back and a heavenly light beaming in his face, accompanying himself on his little organ, that voice, which has lost none of its old time power and pathos, and which has thrilled hundreds of thousands of hearers during his marvellous career, goes up in a glorious volume of sound, penetrating to the remotest corners of the great hall and touching every heart. Then follows the great chorus from all lips, but those whose voices are choked by tears.

Mr. Moody has received the cordial assistance and co-operation of the pastors and church-members of the city. Among the large number who have participated in the services are Rev. Teunis Hamlin, D. D., Bishop Hurst, Rev. E. D. Bailey, Ex-Judge Strong, Senator Pepper, Congressman Morse, Judge I. G. Kimball, Dr. J. J. Muir, Rev. Hugh Johnson, Rev. Dr. Todd, Rev. Joseph T. Kelly, Rev. I. W. Cantor, Dr. R. H. McKim, Dr. W. A. Bartlett, Dr. Luther B. Wilson, Rev. G. O. Little, Dr. Mackey Smith and Rev. S. H. Greene.

A noticeable feature, which impressed even the reporters of the secular journals, was the change in the manner of the audiences, which was visible as the meetings progressed. "At first," says the "Evening Star," "it seemed to be a crowd of the curious; then it became a congregation of the convinced, earnestness being the pronounced and prevalent expression on all faces; and it is now fast becoming a communion of joyful converts. There is a light of gladness now on countenances, which probably never before had borne anything but a scornful smile when the subject of Christianity was broached." Those who were present when on a recent evening Mr. Moody asked all who were resolved in Christ's strength to begin a new life to say "I will," are never likely to forget the resounding response which sprang from thousands of throats. Cards have been distributed to those who have been impressed, which they will fill up with their names and addresses, so that the pastors of the city may continue personal work after the meetings are concluded. The movement is in the truest sense of the word a revival. The value of the work done is not to be measured by the number of converts, although, even so measured, the result is enormous. Mr. Moody has had much to say to believers. At some of the meetings his remarks have been addressed to them almost exclusively. He has strong faith in the power of personal influence and personal effort. His appeals have been very earnest to Christian people to work for Christ in their homes, in their business relations, among their acquaintances and friends. Probably the most stirring words he has spoken have been those addressed to Christians, and already

CHRIST THE CONQUEROR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday in the Brooklyn Tabernacle.

Text: Isaiah 63: 1, "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, traveling in the greatness of his strength?"

EDOM and Bozrah, having been the scene of fierce battle, when those words are used here or in any other part of the Bible, they are figures of speech setting forth scenes of severe conflict. As now we often use the word Waterloo to describe a decisive contest of any kind, so the words Bozrah and Edom in this text are figures of speech descriptive of a scene of great slaughter. Whatever else the prophet may have meant to describe, he most certainly meant to depict the Lord Jesus Christ, saying, "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, traveling in the greatness of his strength?"

When a general is about to go out to the wars, a flag and a sword are publicly presented to him, and the maidens bring flowers, and the young men load the cannon, and the train starts amidst a huzza that drowns the thunder of the wheels and the shriek of the whistle. But all this will give no idea of the excitement that there must have been in heaven when Christ started out on the campaign of the world's conquest. If they could have foreseen the siege that would be laid to him, and the maltreatment he would suffer, and the burdens he would have to carry, and the battles he would have to fight, I think there would have been a million volunteers in heaven who would have insisted on coming along with him; but no, they only accompanied him to the gate, their last shout heard clear down to the earth, the space between the two worlds bridged with a great hosanna. You know there is a wide difference between a man's going off to battle and coming back again. When he goes off, it is with epaulets unangled, with banner unspecked, with horses sleek and shining from the groom. All that there is of struggle and pain is to come yet. So it was with Christ. He had not yet fought a battle. He was starting out, and though this world did not give him a warm-hearted greeting, there was a gentle mother who folded him in her arms; and a babe finds no difference between a stable and a palace, between courtiers and camel-drivers. As Jesus stepped on the stage of this world, it was amidst angelic shouts in the galleries and amidst the kindest maternal ministrations. But soon hostile forces began to gather. They deployed from the Sanhedrin. They were detailed from the standing army. They came out from the Caesarean castles. The vagabonds in the street joined the gentlemen of the mansion. Spirits rode up from hell, and in long array there came a force together that threatened to put to rout this newly-arrived one from heaven. Jesus now seeing the battle gathering, lifted his own standard; but who gathered about it? How feeble the recruits! A few shaven men, a blind beggar, a woman with an alabaster box, another woman with two mites, and a group of friendless, moneyless and positionless people came to his standard. What chance was there for him? Nazareth against him. Bethlehem against him. Capernaum against him. Jerusalem against him. Galilee against him. The courts against him. The army against him. The throne against him. The world against him. All hell against him. No wonder they asked him to surrender. But he could not surrender, he could not apologize, he could not take any back steps. He had come to strike for the deliverance of an enslaved race, and he must do the work. Then they sent out their pickets to watch him. They saw in what house he went, and when he came out. They watched what he ate, and who with; what he drank, and how much. They did not dare to make their final assault, for they knew not but that behind him there might be a reinforcement that was not seen. But at last the battle came. It was to be more fierce than Bozrah, more bloody than Gettysburg, involving more than Austerlitz, more combatants employed than at Chalons, a ghastlier conflict than all the battles of the earth put together, though Edmund Burke's estimate of thirty-five thousand millions of the slain be accurate. The day was Friday. The hour was between twelve and three o'clock. The field was a slight hillock north-west of Jerusalem. The forces engaged were earth and hell, joined as allies on one side, and heaven, represented by a solitary inhabitant, on the other.

The hour came. Oh, what a time it was! I think that that day the universe looked on. The spirits that could be spared from the heavenly temple, and could get conveyance of wing or chariot, came down from above, and spirits getting furlough from beneath came up; and they listened, and they looked, and they watched. Oh, what an uneven battle! Two worlds armed on one side; an unarmed man on the other. The regiment of the Roman army at that time stationed at Jerusalem began the attack. They knew how to fight, for they belonged to the most thoroughly drilled army of all the world. With spears glittering in the sun, they charged up the hill. The horses prance and rear amidst the excitement of the populace—the heels of the riders plunged in the flanks, urging them on. The weapons begin to tell on Christ. See how faint he looks! There the blood starts, and there and there. If he is to have reinforcements, let him call them up now. No; he must do this work alone—alone. He is dying. Feel for yourself of the wrist; the pulse is feeble. Feel under the arm: the warmth is less. He is dying. Ay, they pronounce him dead. And just at that moment that they pronounced him dead he rallied, and from his wounds he unsheathed a weapon which staggered the Roman legions down the hill, and hurled the Satanic battalions into the pit. It was a weapon of love—infinite love, all-conquering love. Mightier than javelin or spear, it triumphed over all. Put back, ye armies of earth and hell! The tide of battle turns. Jesus hath overcome. Let the people stand apart and make a line, that he may pass down from Calvary to Jerusalem, and thence on and out all around the world. The battle is fought. The victory is achieved. The triumphal march is begun. Hark to the hoofs of the warrior's steed, and the tramping of a great multitude! for he has many friends now. The Hero of earth and heaven advances. Cheer! cheer! "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, travelling in the greatness of his strength?"

We behold here a new revelation of a blessed and startling fact. People talk of Christ as though he were going to do something grand for us after a while. He has done it. People talk as though, ten or twenty years from now, in the closing hours of our life, or in some terrible pass of life, Jesus will help us. He has done the work already. He did it eighteen hundred and sixty-one years ago. You might as well talk of Washington as though he were going to achieve our national independence in 1950, as to speak of Christ as though he were going to achieve our salvation in the future. He did it in the year of our Lord 33, eighteen hundred and sixty-one years ago, on the field of Bozrah, the Captain of our salvation fighting unto death for you and my emancipation. All we have to do is to accept that fact in our heart of hearts, and we are free for this world, and we are free for the world to come. But, lest we might not accept, Christ comes through here to-day, "traveling in the greatness of his strength," not to tell you that he is going to fight for you some battle in the future, but to tell you that the battle is already fought, and the victory already won.

You have noticed that, when soldiers come home from the wars, they carry on their flags the names of the battle-fields where they were distinguished. The Englishman coming back has on his banner Inkermann and Balaklava; the Frenchman, Jena and Eylau; the German, Versailles and Sedan. And Christ has on the banner he carries as conqueror the names of ten thousand battle-fields he won for you and for me. He rides past all our homes of bereavement—by the door-bell swathed in sorrow, by the wardrobe black with woe, by the dismantled fortress of our strength. Come out and greet him to-day, O, ye people! See the names of all the battle-passes on his flag. Ye who are poor, read on this ensign the story of Christ's hard crusts and pillowless head. Ye who are persecuted, read here of the ruffians who chased him from his first breath to his last. Mighty to soothe your troubles, mighty to balm your calamities, mighty to tread down your foes, "traveling in the greatness of his strength." Though his horse be brown with the dust of the march, and the fetlocks be wet with the carnage, and the bit be red with the blood of your spiritual toes, he comes up now, not exhausted from the battle, but fresh as when he went into it—coming up from Bozrah, "traveling in the greatness of his strength."

You know that when Augustus, and Constantine, and Trajan and Titus came back from the wars, what a time there was. You know they came on horseback or in chariots, and there were trophies before and there were captives behind, and there were people shouting on all sides, and there were garlands flung from the window, and over the highway a triumphal arch was sprung. The solid masonry to-day at Beneventum, Rimini and Rome, still tell their admiration for those heroes. And shall we let our Conqueror go without lifting any acclaim? Have we not flowers red enough to depict the carnage, white enough to celebrate the victory, fragrant enough to breathe the joy? Those men of whom I just spoke dragged their victims at the chariot-wheels; but Christ, our Lord, takes those who once were captives and invites them into his chariot to ride, while he puts around them the arm of his strength, saying, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love, and the waters shall not drown it, and the fires shall not burn it, and eternity shall not exhaust it."

If this be true, I cannot see how any man can carry his sorrows a great while. If this Conqueror from Bozrah is going to beat back all your griefs, why not trust him? Oh! do you not feel under this Gospel your griefs falling back, and your tears drying up, as you hear the tramp of a thousand illustrious promises led on by the Conqueror from Bozrah, "traveling, traveling, in the greatness of his strength?"

On that Friday which the Episcopal Church rightly celebrates, calling it "Good-Friday," your soul and mine were contended for. On that day Jesus proved himself mightier than earth and hell; and when the lances struck him, he gathered them up into a sheaf, as a reaper gathers the grain, and he stacked them. Mounting the horse of the Apocalypse, he rode down through the ages, "traveling in the greatness of his strength." On that day your sin and mine perished, if we will only believe it.

There may be some one here who may say, "I don't like the color of this Conqueror's garments. You tell me that his garments were not only spattered with the blood of conflict, but also that they were soaked, that they were saturated, that they were dyed in it." I admit it. You say you do not like that. Then I quote to you two passages of Scripture: "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission." "In the blood is the atonement." But it was not your blood. It was his own. Not only enough to redden his garments and to redden his horse, but enough to wash away the sins of the world. Oh the blood on his brow, the blood on his hands, the blood on his feet, the blood on his side! It seems as if an artery must have been cut.

There is a fountain filled with blood
Drawn from Emmanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood Lose all their guilty stains.

At two o'clock to-morrow afternoon go among the places of business or toil. It will be no difficult thing for you to find men who, by their looks, show you that they are overworked. They are prematurely old. They are hastening rapidly toward their decease. They have gone through crises in business that shattered their nervous system, and pulled on the brain. They have a shortness of breath, and a pain in the back of the head, and at night an insomnia that alarms them. Why are they drudging at business early and late? For fun? No; it would be difficult to extract any amusement out of that exhaustion. Because they are avaricious? In many cases no. Because their own personal expenses are lavish? No; a few hundred dollars would meet all their wants. The simple fact is, the man is enduring all that fatigue and exasperation, and wear and tear, to keep his home prosperous. There is an invisible line reaching from that store, from that bank, from that shop, from that scaffolding, to a quiet scene a few blocks, a few miles away, and there is the secret of that business endurance. He is simply the champion of a homestead, for which he wins bread, and wardrobe, and education, and prosperity, and in such battle ten thousand men fall. Of ten business men whom I bury, nine die of overwork for others. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

At one o'clock to-morrow morning, the hour when slumber is most uninterrupted and most profound, walk amid the dwelling-houses of the city. Here and there you will find a dim light, because it is the household custom to keep a subdued light burning; but most of the houses from base to top are as dark as though uninhabited. A merciful God has sent forth the archangel of sleep, and he puts his wings over the city. But yonder is a clear light burning, and outside on the window casement a glass or pitcher containing food for a sick child; the food is set in the fresh air. This is the sixth night that mother has sat up with that sufferer. She has to the last point obeyed the physician's prescription, not giving a drop too much or too little, or a moment too soon or too late. She is very anxious, for she has buried three children with the same disease, and she prays and weeps, each prayer and sob ending with a kiss of the pale cheek. By dint of kindness she gets the little one through the ordeal. After it is all over, the mother is taken down. Brain or nervous fever sets in and one day she leaves the convalescent child with a mother's blessing, and goes up to join the three in the kingdom of heaven. Life for life. Substitution!

Or perhaps the mother lingers long enough to see a son get on the wrong road and his former kindness becomes rough reply when she expresses anxiety about him. But she goes right on, looking carefully after his apparel, remembering him every birthday with some memento, and when he is brought home worn out with dissition, nurses him till he gets well and sets him again, and hopes, and expects, and prays, and counsels, and suffers, until her strength gives out and she fails. She is going in and attendants, bending over her pillow, as if she has any message to leave, and she makes great effort to say something, but out of three or four minutes of indistinct utterance they can catch but three words, "My poor boy!" The simple fact is she died for him. Life for life. Substitution!

About thirty-four years ago there went forth from our homes hundreds of thousands of men to do battle for their country. All the poetry of war soon vanished, and left them nothing but the terrible prose. They waded knee deep in mud. They slept in now-banks. They marched till their cut feet tracked the earth. They were swindled out of their honest rations, and lived on meat not fit for a dog. They had jaws all fractured, and eyes extinguished, and limbs set away. Thousands of them cried for water as they lay dying on the field the night after the battle, and got it not. They were homesick, and received no message from their loved ones. They died in barns, in bushes, in ditches, the buzzards of the summer heat the only attendants on their requies. No one but the infinite God who knows everything, knows the ten thousandth part of the length, and breadth, and depth, and height of anguish of the Northern and Southern battlefields. Why did these fathers leave their children and go to the front, and why did these young men, postponing the marriage-day, start out into the probabilities of never coming back! For their country they died. Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution!

But we need not go so far. What is that monument in Greenwood? It is to the doctors who fell in the Southern epidemics. Why go? Were there not enough sick to be attended in these Northern latitudes? Oh, yes; but the doctor puts a few medical books in his valise, and some vials of medicine, and leaves his patients here in the hands of other physicians, and takes the rail-train. Before he gets to the infected regions he passes crowded rail-trains, regular and extra, taking the flying and affrighted populations. He arrives in a city over which a great horror is brooding. He goes from couch to couch, feeling of pulse and studying symptoms, and prescribing day after day, night after night, until a fellow-physician says: "Doctor, you had better go home and rest; you look miserable." But he cannot rest while so many are suffering. On and on, until some morning finds him in a cirium, in which he talks of home, and then rises and says he must go and look after those patients. He is told to lie down; but he fights his attendants until he falls sick, and is weaker and weaker, and dies of people with whom he had no kinship, and far away from his own family, and is hastily put away in a stranger's tomb, and only the fifth part of a newspaper line tells of his sacrifice—his name just mentioned among five. Yet he has touched the furthest height of sublimity in that three weeks of humanitarian service. He goes straight as an arrow to the bosom of him who said: "I was sick and ye visited me." Life for life. Blood for blood. Substitution! Some of our modern theologians who want to give God lessons about the best way to save the world, tell us they do not want any blood in their redemption. They want to take this horse by the bit, and hurl him back on his haunches, and tell this rider from Bozrah to go around some other way. Look out, lest ye fall under the flying hoofs of this horse; lest ye go down under the sword of this Conqueror from Bozrah! What meant the blood of the dragons in the old dispensation? the blood of the bullock? the blood of the heifer? the blood of the lamb? It meant to prophesy the cleansing blood, the pardoning blood, the healing blood of this Conqueror who comes up from Bozrah, "traveling in the greatness of his strength." I catch a handful of the red torrent that rushes out from the heart of the Lord, and I throw it over my audience, hoping that one drop of its cleansing power may come upon your soul. O Jesus! in that crimson tide wash our souls! We accept thy sacrifice! Conqueror of Bozrah, have mercy upon us! We throw our garments in the way! We fall into line! Ride on, Jesus, ride on! "Traveling, traveling is the greatness of thy strength."

But after awhile, the returning Conqueror will reach the gate, and all the armies of the saved will be with him. I hope you will be there, and I will be there. As we go through the gate and around about the throne for the review, "a great multitude that no man can number"—all heaven can tell without asking, right away, which one is Jesus, not only because of the brightness of his face, but because, while all the other inhabitants in glory are robed in white—saints in white, cherubim in white, seraphim in white—his robes shall be scarlet, even the dyed garments of Bozrah. I catch a glimpse of that triumphant joy, but the gate opens and shuts so quickly, I can hear only half a sentence, and it is this, "Unto him who hath washed us in his blood!"

Missionary Hardships.

Our Sunday School Missionary Records his Experiences during a Recent Tour.

REV. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary of the American Sunday School Union in the Southwest, writes an interesting letter describing a recent journey to the most remote parts of the State, during which he succeeded in organizing several Sunday Schools in new territory. After various adventures (in one of which his valise was washed away while he was fording a stream, and recovered with difficulty), he rode up in front of a farmhouse and asked if he could be accommodated there for the night, offering of course to pay for the privilege. Although man and horse were evidently tired and night coming on, shelter was refused and the wearied missionary was compelled to move forward. At his next stopping-place—the house of a German farmer—he was more successful and was cheerfully accommodated. "After a humble repast," he writes, "I was conducted to an upper room. That night, the rain poured down in a torrent, and poured in abundantly; for, when morning came, it seemed that the water was an inch or two deep on the floor, but none had fallen on my bed."

At the end of eighteen days, Mr. Sharp returned home, "having organized five schools, visited and addressed others, preached in several country churches, visited many families, and traveled I suppose, near 500 miles and distributed Gospel literature." During the whole tour he had only one serious attack of illness, the result of a severe chill from being wet through.

In a former letter, our missionary wrote of several new church houses having been erected where he had organized Sunday Schools in the common school houses, for want of a church. "The good news now comes of a precious meeting there," he writes of one place, "the conversions including some influential persons in the neighborhood. At another place I preached where the community were enjoying a meeting that overshadowed any other in public interest. The Lord was giving showers of blessings. While there I met a man from another neighborhood, distant probably six miles, at whose house I had lodged when I organized in a school house. He told me that their Sunday School now meets in a church recently erected. Thus from time to time, as I travel, I hear of the erection of houses of worship where there was none when I organized Sunday Schools."

Friendless Women Helped.

The Day-Star Industrial Home and its Benevolent Mission among the Unemployed and Destitute.

IN the history of Christian work in New York, there are many instances where brave and consecrated women, poor in this world's goods, yet in the love of Christ possessing all things, have become instrumental in the establishment of noble philanthropies in behalf of the moral and social elevation of their own sex. Such women as Bella Cooke, the bedridden missionary, Mrs. Josephine Williamson, long of the Florence Mission, and now foundress of the Permanent Home for Fallen Women, Mrs. Whittemore of the Door of Hope, who have given a lifetime of self-sacrificing work for their sisters, are already wellknown to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One of the most devoted and effective workers in this particular field is Mrs. E. G. Draper, better known as "Sister Charlotte," whose labors among women during the last few years have been the means of reclaiming many from lives of sin to careers of Christian usefulness.

Within a very recent period, Sister Charlotte has succeeded in founding a new institution of a most worthy character in New York City—The Day-Star Industrial Home for Friendless and Destitute Women. As its name implies, the Home is designed to furnish temporary employment to women, by which they may earn shelter, food and clothing, until suitable outside work can be found for them. It surrounds them with the sweet influences of the Gospel and seeks to awaken in their hearts the love of a pure and useful life, and especially to elevate to honorable self-support those who, through misfortune or dis-solute associations, have become degraded and discouraged. The Home is located at No. 213 West 24th St., and is a plain, substantial building, with sufficient accommodations for a comfortably large household. It is conducted by a Committee of Management consisting of Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D., Calvary Baptist Church; Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D., Dutch Reformed Church; Mr. C. N. Crittenton, founder of the Forence Missions, and Messrs J. S. Huyler, A. S. Hatch, John H. Prall, and S. H. Hadley, the three first-named all active Christian philanthropists and the last the Superintendent of the Jervy McAuley Mission in New York. Sister Charlotte is manager of the Home, which, at the present time, has something over a dozen inmates, although it has frequently had more. Since it was opened, nearly eighty-five have passed through, of whom sixty-five have been placed in situations in good homes in different parts of the county. There are twenty beds for the use of inmates, five of them, together with full equipment, having been the donation of Rev. Dr. Parkhurst of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church.

It is a peculiarity of most Homes for women that they are reserved only for the dis-solute and fallen; but the Day-Star opens its door to friendless, destitute women of all classes who are willing to come under its conditions. It is the only institution in New York where a respectable but penniless woman can go and be admitted. It is neither a hospital for the invalid nor a refuge for the idle, the lazy or the vicious, but it gives a ready welcome to those who are willing to work or reform. Many of the women who apply have references from former employers. New inmates are taught housework or sewing, and positions are found for them as soon as they are qualified. Many who have been received and trained in the Home are now filling positions as companions, dress-makers, general houseworkers, cooks, laundresses, housecleaners, etc. Employers frequently send to the Home for various classes of labor to fill demands, and as no woman is sent out who has not proved herself capable and fairly reliable, besides having shown an improvement in character such as never was achieved, the result is generally satisfactory.

Like all similar institutions, the Home is feeling the effects of the prevailing "hard times." Its principal patrons, Messrs. Crittenton, Prall, and Huyler, together with Mr. A. M. Dennett, have all given liberally toward it, but as the expenses are in the neighborhood of three hundred and fifty dollars a month, it is liable, in the absence of other support, to be embarrassed for the want of resources. Originally established for helping middle-aged destitute women, so many young women applied that Sister Charlotte, in pure goodness of heart, after listening to their stories and finding that most of them had good references, could not turn them away. Any woman in need is accepted, unless the Home happens to be crowded to its full capacity at the time. Lately, on account of diminished resources, the Manager was compelled, greatly against her inclination, to turn applicants away. The Home holds twenty inmates and she has never sent a woman away when she had an empty bed if she thought she could help her; but owing to the hard times, all the rooms are now crowded and she is compelled to send sometimes as many as eight or ten away in a day.

Religious services of an undenominational character are held regularly in the Home. One of the interesting features is the Bible Reading which takes place in the parlor, at four o'clock every Sunday afternoon, when four prominent Christian ladies well known in society—Mrs. Ruggles, Mrs. Glen Taylor, Mrs. Gwindon, and one other—conduct the exercises. There is a full attendance of the inmates and much good has been done.

Any reader desiring to further this deserving work may address Sister Charlotte at No. 213 W. 24th St., New York City.

A REPENTANT BIBLE-BURNER.

A society of men, most of whom had enjoyed a liberal education and were persons of polished manners, but had unappily imbibed infidel principles, used to assemble at each other's houses for the purpose of ridiculing the Scriptures, and of hardening one another in their unbelief. At last they unanimously formed a resolution solemnly to burn the Bible, and so to be troubled no more with a book so hostile to their principles and disquieting to their consciences. The day fixed upon arrived; a large fire was prepared, a Bible was laid on the table, and a flowing bowl ready to drink its dregs.

For the execution of their plan they fixed upon a young man of high birth, brilliant vivacity and elegant manners. He undertook the task, and, after a few enlivening glasses, amidst the applause of his jovial compeers, he approached the table, took up the Bible, and was walking leisurely forward to put it into the fire; but, happening to give it a look, he was seized with trembling, paleness overspread his countenance, and he seemed convulsed. He returned to the table, and, laying down the Bible, said with a strong asseveration, "We will not burn that Book till we can get a better." Soon after, this same gay and lively young man died, and on his death-bed was led to true repentance, and derived hopes of forgiveness and of future blessedness from that Book which he was once about to burn.

FIRST CAR-LOAD FOR THE FOOD FUND.

It Carries 41,680 Pounds of Flour and is the Gift of Friends in Kansas—Contributions and Prayers still Flowing in—The Fund is now $15,000.

If a sceptic, who is disposed to doubt the existence of practical Christianity in the world, were privileged to peruse some of the hundreds of letters that are received every day by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Food Fund, he would be confronted by such an overwhelming volume of testimony to the goodness of God and the strong faith of his people as would compel a pause in his unbelief. Every letter is a benediction. They reach us by every mail, laden with gifts and prayers from God's people in every part of this continent, who have been stirred to deeds of kindness by the knowledge of the sufferings of New York's poor. No religion, save that of Jesus, could have opened the fountain-springs for such a swelling tide of charity as this, which flows straight from the hearts of His followers. It is one of the highest evidences of their fellowship with Him, who, while on earth, had His lot among the lowly and never turned a deaf ear to their petitions, or forbore to relieve their distresses.

Praying and giving, illustrating in the most practical manner the faith that is productive of good works, is the universal theme of these letters. Each offering is sent with a prayer which multiplies its value fourfold; prayers for the work, for the work-loaves of bread. This is practically a whole week's bread supply for the Fund—the consumption on Saturday last being 6,800 loaves.

It is a magnificent tribute of sympathy from the generous-hearted people of the West, and is bestowed in a worthy cause and at a time when it cannot fail to do the greatest good. The flour was shipped by the Missouri Pacific Railway, which kindly agreed to carry it on its road at half tariff rates. These are the contributors of the "Pioneer Car-load."

destitute even more urgent than before. At the two principal stations, No. 210 Eighth Avenue and No. 12 Stuyvesant Street, the applications for relief are daily increasing. If the contributors to the Fund could only visit either of these stations and see for themselves the gaunt and almost spectral-looking beings, whose sad eyes and hollow cheeks tell of long vigils of fasting and penury, they would be filled with the spirit of thankfulness that the Lord had moved them to send on a mite to help.

Some of the cases now being relieved at the Stuyvesant Street station are peculiarly touching. In a tenement in East 11th Street, the District Visitor found an American Protestant widow, with three children—one an idiot and utterly helpless. Neither fire nor food were in the cheerless home, and the sick child lay on the floor, rolled up in an old quilt. In vain the mother had sought for work, and when the Fund came to her rescue, hope had almost died out.

Another pitiful case was that of a German Protestant widow who was discovered living with her children in a basement on East 12th Street, which was little better than a cellar. Two of the little ones were sick of measles and lay on a bundle of rags on the floor. The third—a boy—had picked up a few coals on the street and made a fire whose titful flame only served to reveal the poverty of the surroundings. Medicines, fuel and food were furnished.

At the Stuyvesant Street Station, a man called and appealed for help for his starving family. His wife had died a few days be-operating with the Food Fund, write most encouragingly of the spiritual results in their several districts. Rev. J. C. Thoms, of the Mariner's Temple, writes of the destitute in his parish who are receiving relief: "The supply has been a God-send. One and another of our poor have borne testimony to their faith in Jesus Christ, to whom they were led by the kindness shown to them in the distribution of food which came to them through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Five were received into the church last night, and three of them testified that they were led to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ through the kindness of Christian friends ministering to their physical necessities and then pointing them to the love of Jesus Christ as the only way of salvation to fallen men."

Rev. J. B. Stansberry, Sullivan Street Church, writes: "Those families who have been cared for and fed and warmed through your influence, pray God's blessing upon all of your efforts that are good in his sight. They received the aid with thankful hearts, and departed with rejoicing and praise to their benefactors."

Those who have supported the Food Fund up to the present time, have the satisfaction of knowing that the example of Christian liberality they have shown has not been in vain. Since the Fund began its operations six weeks ago, when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD lifted the veil that hid a part of the silent suffering of the uncomplaining thousands, a great wave of public sympathy has risen in behalf of the destitute poor. A good example is contagious and movements have been multiplied for the supplying of free bread and clothing to the needy. In some cases this has been done irregularly and spasmodically; in others with something approaching to system and with excellent results. The revelation of the phenomenal suffering among the really worthy and industrious poor has stirred up the churches of all denominations alike to energetic measures and many relief committees are now hard at work. Among others, the Catholic churches have been aroused to unwonted activity and the Hebrew charities have also awakened to the fact that they have an urgent duty to perform in extending aid to thousands of destitute Jewish families. A large amount of money has been raised by a committee composed of the Mayor and a number of leading bankers and merchants, to buy food for the hungry.

But, although New York has at last realized that want has invaded the homes of a very large portion of the industrial class, the relief measures thus far adopted are far from being adequate for such an emergency. Meanwhile, the distress seems to be nowise diminished, except in those sections of the city where the relief offered has been systematic and continuous.

The Food Fund is now over $15,000. Its progress and expansion during the few weeks of its existence have been phenomenal, and the results accomplished are widespread and beneficent. The same Divine impulse that led our readers to send in their offerings to begin this Christ-like work of charity, will doubtless continue to supply the means until the end shall have been reached. All who desire to share the burden and the blessing of the work, should send their mites to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOOD FUND, Bible House, New York.

The contributions during the week are acknowledged below in part only—many names being unavoidably delayed till next week. During the week over 3,000 garments have been received by the Clothing Department of the Fund, and these are acknowledged on page 149 of this issue.

fore, leaving to her little babe a legacy of poverty and hunger. "The child keeps crying for food," said the father. "I and the others can wait for something to eat, but oh, I can't stand the baby's cry. In God's name, give me some condensed milk, won't you?" His request was granted and other food was also given and the Fund sent its physician to prescribe and care for the tiny patient who had come into the world in such troublous times.

Nearly four hundred families, representing about twenty-two hundred persons, are now relieved every day at the Stuyvesant Street Station. One of the saddest features of the work is the inability to help all who apply. Each family is visited by the Fund's missionaries at least once a week, and thus spiritual as well as temporal food, is given, and they are led to look to the Giver of all good whose kind providence has supplied their wants in so wonderful a manner, through the generosity of his people. Many families now receiving relief, have been spiritually enlightened and have connected themselves with nearby churches, and come under the spiritual care of some neighboring pastor.

A BLESSING TO ALL NATIONS.

S. S. Lesson for Mar. 18, Gen. 18:17-21. Golden Text, Matt. 28:19. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD dealt with Israel as a nation and a people, and so with Egypt, Babylon, Assyria, Persia, etc.: as a people they were blest or chastened. It is true that in all times of their history there has been in Israel a "remnant according to the election of grace" composed of individuals who were foreknown by him and who, in special way, responded to his call as it reached them. The present Gentile dispensation is of another order as we have seen already. It is not like Israel "a nation taken from the midst of another nation," but a people for his name taken out from the nations or the Gentiles. His purpose to have in Israel a people for his name who should be to him "for a people, and for a name and for a praise, and for a glory," conspicuously failed in its accomplishment; but only that he might do a mightier thing, to take out of diverse people of many languages, customs, habits, etc., "a people [of individuals] for his name" to be and so intensely one that all the distinctions of Jew and Gentile, bond or free, male or female should fail to interrupt or hinder this unity. It is close as the stones of a building "fitted together," "built together" or the members of a body, fitted joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth." When once the body of Christ is fully developed, and Christ can take his Bride to himself, God will return to his former order of things and deal again with nations as such.

God's promise to Abraham was that in him and in his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed." In this prospect Abraham was to be like God, and God opened his heart to him as to a friend. But this promise has never yet been literally fulfilled. Neither in the time of her glory in the days of David and Solomon, nor yet in the time of her humiliation in the days of the Lord Jesus, has Israel been a blessing to the nations. David, the "man after God's own heart" had a grievous fall, which left a stain on the name of his God, and hindered the full flow of blessing to the nations which might have come through such a man, who could write such Psalms. And Solomon, who began so well, soon relapsed into the love of strange women, blighting not only his own glory, but the reputation of his God, by uncleanness! Indirectly, Israel has always been a blessing, because to the Jews "were committed the oracles of God;" but directly, Israel has been a curse among the nations; ye shall be an execration, and an astonishment, and a curse and a reproach," has been literally fulfilled. Because of their financial power, all the nations have sought after the Jews, but also for this very reason all the nations have hated them when any found themselves in their power.

But the promises as well as the gifts and calling of God, are not one word which he has spoken shall fail to the ground. The Jews had not yet rejected their Messiah when, through his prophet Zechariah he said in the days just following this captivity in Babylon: "I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem; and Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth; and the mountains of the Lord of hosts, the holy mountains." (Zech. 8:3.) And again: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, behold I will save My people from the east country and from the west country; and I will bring them and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem and they shall be my people and I will be their God in truth and righteousness." Zech. 8:7, 8.) This prophecy has never yet been fulfilled; the Jews are yet scattered; but they are on the move throughout the earth, the nations are trying to shake them off: their tenure of property and of residence among the nations is becoming more and more uncertain, and they themselves are broaching in their own journals the subject of their national return to the land of their fathers, when this shall become an accomplished fact, then and only then, can they be made, in a direct manner, a blessing among all nations.

"Without Repentance;"

But the Time is at Hand.

Since the destruction of Jerusalem, the land of the Jew has been very largely a desert; but the promise of the Lord for the latter days is: "But now I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the Lord of hosts; for the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things." This is being fulfilled in Palestine at the present time. And it will follow, how soon we know not, but it cannot be long: "It shall come to pass that as ye were a curse among the heathen, O house of Judah and house of Israel, so will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing." (Zech. 8:11-13.)

Indirectly the children of Israel are being made a blessing every time the Word of God is opened. In the law of Moses, in the historical, poetical and practical books of the Old Testament, and in the Gospel Epistles and Revelations in the new, we are reading the inspired writings of Israelitish authors, while the bulk of their people who live among us set little or no value upon the treasure which they have thus given to us! Now it is the Gentile who seeks to bring blessing to the Jews through the very Scriptures which have been preserved by the Jews, and it is a remarkable fact that at the present time almost all the educated, and many uneducated, poor have read the New Testament. But tables will be turned ere long, and when our Master shall have succeeded in conforming unto himself a people for his name from among the Gentiles, then "darkness shall cover the earth and gross darkness the people" in the time of the "tribulation," but the Lord shall arise upon Zion and his glory shall be seen upon her. "And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." Then it is that the nations shall be blessed through the seed of Abraham, for God says: "I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles" (Isa. 46:10). That will be indeed a time of missionary enterprise when God himself shall send forth those whom he has prepared. They need to learn no languages; the Jews have those among them who know every language that is spoken; no consideration of climate will hinder them; there are Jews who have traveled in every clime; the work will not be crippled for lack of funds; when the wealthy Jews are filled with missionary zeal, nothing shall stand in the way; a nation shall be "born in one day." (Isa. 46:8 R. V.)

Meanwhile, during the little time which intervenes, we have our Lord's charge to us. While "the fullness of the Gentiles" is not yet come in, while we are waiting for the Lord's return, while the future missionaries of the world are yet blind and deaf to this calling,

Go Ye.

"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth; go ye therefore." Until the mighty national movement of the Jews to convert the world takes place, don't be afraid to go in ones and twos and dozens to preach the Gospel among all nations, "All power" to open the door, "all power" with governments, "all power" to shed light and conviction into the morally obtuse heathen mind "is given unto me," and ye "heirs of God and joint heirs with me." If ye suffer with me come into your inheritance of thy power, in fitting up my ministry, I send you no warfare on your own charges. "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

"They which are of faith are the children of Abraham, and may claim with him, as starry seed, to be blest and to be a blessing. True, we cannot look for the world to be evangelized until the seed of Abraham recognize their calling. But how many of the "people for his name" yet remain to be called out! How many might yet turn to God from idols to serve the living and the true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven. Unbelief speaks of the difficulties in missionary work, much more than the guarantee of "all power," which the Lord has given us. But those whom he sends out to the nations he sends with the same equipment with which he was sent on earth: "As my Father hath sent me, even so, send I you. . . Receive ye (as I have received for my ministry) the Holy Ghost."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

The International Lesson Committee gives the teacher this week the option of taking a Temperance or a Missionary lesson, and as Mrs. Baxter's remarks are based on the latter, it may be helpful to teachers if this column is devoted to the former subject. The passage selected by the Committee, as the basis of the lesson, is Prov. 20:1-7, with the first verse as a Golden Text. There can be no question as to the importance of the subject. Of all the evils that afflict our country none does so much mischief or produces so much misery as the habit of drinking intoxicating liquor. Not only does the annual consumption entail a heavy expenditure, which is increasing at an enormous rate, but the poverty and crime which result from drunkenness are appalling in extent. The hope of the country for deliverance lies with the young people. If they can be induced to abstain, the next generation will see the evil abated. The teacher may be able to exert a most valuable influence in this direction, by pointing out the insidious danger of the habit of drinking intoxicating beverages, the almost imperceptible stages by which the habit is acquired and drawing a picture of the evil that results from it. Unhappily, illustrations are only too common; there is no community without them. Any child knows that drunkenness is a disgrace and an evil, but he should be made to realize that the danger lies in the first glass and that the man whom he sees drunk was once as far from it as he is and never expected to become a drunkard. In short, that like a poisonous snake, intoxicating drink should be avoided as a dangerous thing to meddle with.

Wine is a mocker. Many have found it so. The first few times of moderate indulgence may be pleasant, and the young man may think that he is adding safely to the joys of life. It is a vain dream from which he will wake to find himself a slave in bonds he cannot break. In Texas, recently, an old lady met her death in a remarkable and sad way. On board a train running at a high rate of speed, she arose from her couch while asleep and deliberately walked to the door, stepped off the platform, and was instantly dashed to death. Doubtless, in her dreams, she thought she was walking in a path of safety, and maybe in those of pleasure and joy. But such imaginations did not alter the great laws of gravitation, and momentum and concussion, which resulted in her death when she stepped off the rapidly moving train. There are ways that seem right and safe and pleasant, but which nevertheless suddenly end in death.

Whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. There is an old Greek fable which illustrates the insidious nature of the drinking habit, which is so easy to acquire and so difficult to break. They said that Hercules desired a beautiful white garment for use on a special occasion. Such a garment was sent to him by his enemy, who had previously anointed it with poison. Hercules arrayed himself in it and admired his own appearance; but as he became warm the poison in the garment began to take effect. Soon Hercules became tortured with pain. He tried to take off the garment, but it adhered to his flesh, and the more he struggled, the firmer it held. At last, in his agony, he tore off the garment and his flesh came with it. Then, in a paroxysm of suffering, he flung himself on a pyre and was burned to death.

Whoso provoketh him. An English publication reports a tragedy in the Zoological Gardens in London. It says that a party of sailors in the course of their tour through the various rooms entered the snake-house. They were cautioned against intermingling with the reptiles, as bites of some of them were deadly. One of the sailors, however, prided himself on his knowledge of snakes and on his ability to handle them with impunity. He explained to his companions how it might be done, and then gave a practical exhibition of his power. He seized one of the most venomous snakes by the neck and held it up at arm's length, showing that it was impossible for any snake to bite, if held in that position. But as he talked, the snake coiled itself around his arm and gave a mighty grip to it, taking by the motion another turn around the limb. One more convulsive effort and the man's arm cracked and his muscles lost their power. He could no longer retain his grip on the snake's neck, and as he loosed it, the angry reptile turned around, and, a moment, its fangs were in his wrist, and the fatal poison went coursing through his body. In less than an hour the man was dead. "There is no need for me to abstain," says a young man. "I can control myself I know when to stop." He would not be so confident if he knew the power of the enemy. It has the trick of paralyzing the will power, so that the man cannot stop when he wishes to do so.

Smeth against his own soul. Shakespeare's words are often literally true that he who drinks intoxicants takes an enemy into his mouth that steals away his brains. The crazy man and the suicide often become so by way of the bottle. "In the forest," says a preacher, "I saw a beautiful tall tree slowly dying, strangled by great coils of ivy. There is no possibility of untwisting the folds, they are too giant-like and fast fixed, and every hour the rootlets of the climber are sucking the life out of the unhappy tree. Yet there was a day when the ivy was a tiny aspirant, only asking a little aid in its climbing; had it been denied then the tree had never become its victim, but degrees the humble weakling grew in strength and arrogance, and at last it assumed the mastery, and the tall tree became the prey of the creeping, insinuating destroyer. The moral is too obvious. Sorrowfully do we remember many, many noble characters which have been ruined little and little by insinuating habits. Drink has been the ivy in many cases."

Therefore shall he beg. Drunkenness is a fruitful cause of poverty. It leads to idleness and waste. A physician, walking in the country, met a man who was hurrying along the path. The man accosted the physician, as they passed, with the question, "Is this the way to the poorhouse?" The kind, hearted doctor looked the man over sympathetically and putting his hand on the top of a bottle of whiskey, which protruded from his pocket, replied, "No, but this is."

His children are blessed after him. An incident was related by Rev. Charles Garrett in the course of his reply to one who contended that every man had a right to drink if he did not go to excess. Mr. Garrett argued that the influence of example should weigh in coming to a decision on the subject. He said: "I am very fond of mountain climbing. I think I have a steadier foot and a cooler head than most men and never feel fear, no matter how dizzy is the height on which I stand. Last summer was one of a party in Switzerland and one of our excursions I left the party to climb a precipice, which was very dangerous. I had full confidence of being able to hold on, although even my nerves were tried by the precipitous height. When about half-way up I heard a voice behind me, glanced around and saw in the distance my little boy following me. I turned sick with dismay and returned as quickly as I could and took the safer path. So it is, my friend, with the moderate drinker; you may be able to keep from falling, but can you be sure that the boys and young men who are following you, perhaps without your knowledge, can tread that path with safety?"

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

HEREDITARY LEGISLATORS.

RADICALS in the English Parliament have, during the past few weeks, begun an active crusade against the power of the house of Lords. Their recent grievance consists chiefly in the amendments the House of Peers has made to several of the bills passed by the House of Commons. This interference, added to the fact that the bill for Irish self-government was rejected by them, has provoked a demand from the extreme section of the Liberal Party that the House of Lords shall be abolished altogether, or, as a more moderate change, that the Upper House shall be debarred from rejecting or altering, a measure which has passed the Lower House by a large majority. Mr. Gladstone was expected to make a declaration on Feb. 20th, pledging his party to such a change, but he contented himself with pointing out the effect of the interference of the Lords without suggesting any constitutional change. It is probable, however, that a proposal to curtail the power of the Lords will be incorporated into the Radical platform. It will have a rational basis in the recent flagrant misconduct of several members of the Upper House. These men, notorious for their profligacy and stupidity, have the right to vote on all questions of legislation and to help make laws while themselves being lawbreakers. The Radicals contend that the anomaly would cease if the members did not sit and vote by right of their birth, but could obtain their seats only by popular election. It is doubtful, however, whether public opinion is as yet prepared for the change, the English people being reluctant to make radical alterations in their constitution. That the question has been raised and that it has obtained so much support as it has, is due to the fact that so many of the Lords, like other rulers, hereditary and elected alike, have forgotten that God has said, "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God." (II. Samuel 23: 3.)

The Value of an Arm.

Three arbitrators were engaged on Feb. 14th in assessing the sum which should be awarded a man residing at Lancaster, Pa., as compensation for the loss of an arm. Some months ago while walking on the turnpike road an accident occurred to the cable which is used as a safeguard for the electric cars. The cable snapped under a sudden strain and the end caught the man around the body and dragged him to the ground. His right arm was twisted and injured so severely that it had to be amputated. On his recovery he made a claim against the Traction Company which was submitted to arbitration. The arbitrators having heard the man's statement of his suffering and of the loss he would suffer in his business through his being maimed, decided on awarding him twenty thousand dollars as compensation. The company deems the amount excessive, although it is much less than the injured man claimed. It may be hoped that as he places so high a value on one member of his body he has not failed to realize the value of his soul. Some men think so lightly of that, that they are willing to barter it for temporary gain or pleasure. (Matt. 16: 26.)

A Subterranean Lake.

An interesting discovery has been made recently by engineers connected with the Government Geographical Department. It has long been a mystery where the water came from which supplies the South Dakota artesian basin. It has been tapped during the past few years at various parts of the State and a large quantity of water has been found. Not long ago the Government ordered a survey of the Missouri River, no survey having been made since 1878. Measurements have accordingly been made of the volume of water at certain intervals between Great Falls, Mont., and Sioux City, Iowa. The engineers were surprised to find that the quantity of water at Fort Benton was smaller than the quantity at Great Falls, which is twenty-five miles farther up the river. Between Fort Benton and Sioux City there was a gradually increasing volume of water, but between Fort Benton and Great Falls the difference was 445 cubic feet per second. The question arose of what became of that enormous quantity of water which the river lost in that course of twenty-five miles. A clue to the mystery was found in the fact that in a pool midway between the two towns eyeless fishes have been caught, which are only found in subterranean water courses. From the two facts one of the engineers has deduced the inference that there is an outlet somewhere in the bed of the Missouri which connects with the South Dakota basin and it is in supplying that basin that the Missouri loses its water. The people of South Dakota have thus learned the origin of the precious water that they draw from their artesian wells. The origin of many of the spiritual and material blessings we enjoy is not generally recognized; but the time will come when it will be realized by all that, like the river clear as crystal which John saw, they proceed from the Throne of God. (Rev. 22: 1.)

Held by a Spell.

The immigration commissioners had a remarkable case under discussion in New York last week. The question was as to the admission of a man and woman, who had arrived from Berlin by the steamer "Augusta Victoria." The woman admitted that she was the wife of a wealthy merchant in the German capital, but declared that she intended to marry her companion, who is fifteen years her junior. She has known him from childhood and has always exerted a strange influence over him. His parents sent him here to escape it, but at her bidding, he resigned a good position which he obtained in Philadelphia and returned to Berlin. Finding that the infatuation made their lives unpleasant there, they came last week to this country. The commissioners, therefore, had to decide whether they should admit persons who were avowedly immoral. Ultimately, as the facts of the case were disclosed, they decided to admit the man and released him, pending their decision about the woman. During the hearing of her case, although the man was free to go where he would, he seemed unable to leave the court. The woman kept him at her side and, if he moved away, she made some mesmeric passes with her hands, which brought him helplessly back to her. He ap-

A Claim for Beautifying.

A referee in New York is engaged in hearing testimony in an extraordinary suit. It appears from the plaintiff's testimony that three years ago a fashionable dressmaker in the city went to her to be made beautiful forever. The dressmaker was then over fifty years of age and her face, being deeply wrinkled, indicated her age pretty clearly. The plaintiff, who makes a profession of beautifying plain and elderly ladies, undertook her case, the patient agreeing to pay her two hundred and fifty dollars for the service. The treatment continued for six weeks, at the end of which time, according to the plaintiff's statement, every wrinkle had disappeared and the patient looked not more than thirty years old. But last year, the dressmaker died, without having paid her the fee agreed upon. On presenting her claim the executors refused to pay it and thereupon a suit was begun, which the court turned over to a referee who is hearing testimony, preparatory to making his report. He is concerned only in ascertaining whether the patient agreed to pay the amount claimed, not in estimating the benefit she derived from the operation. Probably peared to be completely under her power and to have no will of his own. Whether her power over him is really occult, cannot be known, but it is certain that it is one he obeys. There are many who thus yield to Satanic influence until they lose their will power and "do the things that they would not." For all such there is no hope of deliverance in themselves, but they may be delivered as others have been who appeal to God through Jesus Christ. (Rom. 7: 19-25.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Bishop Stuart, of New Zealand, has resigned his see to devote the remainder of his life to missionary work in Persia.

Incomplete returns from Conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church indicate a total membership of 127,491, against 122,213 last year.

The number of Lutheran Ministers in the world, according to the Rev. J. N. Lenker's new book, Lutherans in All Lands, is 30,346, with 42,827 churches and 53,080,000 baptized members. Of the churches, 9,727 are credited to America, 23,500 to Germany, 2,514 to Sweden, 960 to Norway and 1,909 to Denmark.

Rev. William Arthur, the veteran author of "The Tongue of Fire," has now taken up his abode at Cannes and is much improved in health. He devotes his leisure to literary pursuits, but takes deep interest in all religious matters. Mr. Arthur is now seventy-five years of age.

From all quarters come reports of a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The Congregationalist quoting from returns published by a St. Louis journal, estimates that during the past four or five weeks in five central and southwestern States, not less than forty-nine thousand persons have united with the churches.

A Church in Ohio, now without a Pastor, seems to be in need of a faithful, persevering man to fill its pulpit. We infer this from the following observation which the retiring minister made in his farewell sermon: "I am willing to relinquish my charge to my unknown successor and may God have mercy on his soul. If he stays long enough, the Philistines are sure to get him."

The number of Women Pastors in the Congregational Church has received an addition by the ordination of Mrs. Frost to be co-pastor with her husband, Rev. George E. Frost over the church at Littleton, Mass. Her examination and her successful labors as a supply show her to be an able theologian and a faithful, powerful preacher.

An excellent work among the poor is being done in Chicago by Dr. J. H. Kellogg of the Battle Creek Sanitarium. Dr. Kellogg makes the rooms of the Pacific Mission in Van Buren street his headquarters, where he sees patients free of charge and afterward goes from house to house in the slums prescribing for the sick. He has a large class of women who are preparing for Foreign Mission work and a number of these have volunteered to go as nurses into the Chicago slums. Altogether Dr. Kellogg has thirty-six trained nurses now at work in Chicago.

Special Services are being held every night in Calvary Baptist Church and Mount Morris Baptist Church, New York and a daily noon service in Association Hall in Twenty-third street. Dr. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn, Dr. H. M. Wharton of Baltimore and Rev. George C. Needham are among the eminent preachers who conduct the services. It is hoped that these may be the beginning of as successful a work in New York as resulted a few weeks ago from a similar effort in Brooklyn.

The following contributions of clothing, etc., for the Relief Fund are acknowledged:

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY ADDRESSING THE ENGLISH HOUSE OF LORDS.

York last week. The question was as to the admission of a man and woman, who had arrived from Berlin by the steamer "Augusta Victoria." The woman admitted that she was the wife of a wealthy merchant in the German capital, but declared that she intended to marry her companion, who is fifteen years her junior. She has known him from childhood and has always exerted a strange influence over him. His parents sent him here to escape it, but at her bidding, he resigned a good position which he obtained in Philadelphia and returned to Berlin. Finding that the infatuation made their lives unpleasant there, they came last week to this country. The commissioners, therefore, had to decide whether they should admit persons who were avowedly immoral. Ultimately, as the facts of the case were disclosed, they decided to admit the man and released him, pending their decision about the woman. During the hearing of her case, although the man was free to go where he would, he seemed unable to leave the court. The woman kept him at her side and, if he moved away, she made some mesmeric passes with her hands, which brought him helplessly back to her. He ap-that was little as the interval was so short between the restoration of her beauty and her death. If the poor lady had known she was to die so soon she might have sought that beauty which really lasts forever, at the hands of Him who has assured those who love him that they shall have neither spot nor wrinkle nor any such thing, but be without blemish. (Eph. 5: 27.)

A Fish From the Sky.

A sportsman living near Lancaster, Pa., had a genuine surprise a few days ago. He observed a large bird, which he supposed was a buzzard, hovering at a considerable height over a plantation. It appeared to have difficulty in rising and after a few moments it began to descend. Then the sportsman saw that it was a large bald eagle. He fired at it, but did not kill it. He thinks, however, that the bird was wounded, for it dropped something from its talons and being relieved of the weight soared away out of sight. He went to see what it had dropped and, to his amazement, found that it was a fish weighing nearly three pounds. It had not been long out of water and the sportsman thinks the eagle must have

THE BIBLE AND THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

A Sermon Preached last Sunday morning by Rev. R. S. MacArthur, D.D. Text:

1. Thess. 5: 21, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

THE apostle here exhorts us to submit all forms of faith to their appropriate test. The word which is translated prove is a very strong expression; it literally means to test by the art of the assayer; it is the word which would be applied to the testing of metals or similar substances. The apostle warns the Thessalonians against receiving statements regarding religious truths on mere assertion. They are exhorted to apply fitting tests, and then to reject whatever is false and to adopt what is true. The same exhortation is appropriate still. God makes a direct appeal to our reason in regard to the subjects of our faith. Reason and revelation, when both are properly understood, are not contradictory. God through the prophet Isaiah distinctly says: "Come now, and let us reason together." The decisions of synods and councils are not necessarily authoritative. Christianity always and everywhere is the friend of free and fair inquiry. But we must remember that it is quite as important to hold fast good things as it is to prove all things.

Our knowledge of the Bible is necessarily progressive. It is evermore true that there is more light to spring forth from the Word of God.

The Bible as a Revelation of God must evermore be beyond the full comprehension of finite men. We can apprehend its truths; we cannot comprehend them in all their significance. Each generation may be expected to make advances in the apprehension of the Bible over the preceding generation. What science has absolutely proved is a truth of God in its sphere as really as what revelation has affirmed. God is one; truth is one. God cannot contradict himself. What he has taught in Genesis must harmonize with what he has taught in geology, when both are rightly interpreted. Between a true science and a divine revelation there must be entire harmony. Our contention is only against a science falsely so called. Science and philosophy are necessary factors in all religious thought. Theologians who speak derogatively of the influences of philosophy really only oppose one system of philosophy against another. This scientific spirit is in the atmosphere to-day, and can neither be denied nor despised. A true theologian will not attempt to do the one or the other. As well might he resist the law of gravitation, or the movements of the tide. But our holy religion is never the enemy of truth wherever found. A true science is the handmaid of Christianity; it is the minister of truth and God. We need have no fear of the "higher criticism," as it has been called. Whatever discovers and declares

Truth is of God,

and is welcomed by his Church. We are concerned only to know that this or any other form of criticism does really discover and declare the truth. That is the whole matter regarding which we should be concerned. We welcome all forms of right examination. The Bible asks no favors and tears no appropriate tests. Reason and conscience have their sphere of authority; but revelation is higher than either or both. Where Scripture plainly speaks, human reason must bow in submission. God as the revealer and the supreme source of authority is back of the revelation which is the channel of that authority.

The Bible should be studied on scientific principles. These principles now dominate in other departments of inquiry, and have their sphere also as applied to the Bible. All investigators of the Bible should bear in mind what is its supreme object and design. Many critics greatly err at this point; they forget the real object of divine revelation. The Bible is not intended to be a treatise on philosophy, science, or history; it is not a text-book on astronomy, geology, chemistry, botany, or geography; it is not an encyclopædia or universal dictionary. It does allude to these subjects, and that with an accuracy, eloquence, and beauty that are simply surprising. Its avoidance of the dangers into which heathen cosmologies have fallen is inexplicable if we deny its divine inspiration; the cosmogony of Pentateuch receives the confirmation of the science of our own century. It has been well said that "there is in the book of Psalms alone more loving descriptions of nature than in all Greek and Roman literature;" and yet such descriptions and allusions are merely incidental. Some of these, however, anticipate many of

The Discoveries of Science.

The great design of the Bible is to teach religious truth; it is to supply man's religious necessities. This design is ever paramount. Baronius long ago said: "The scriptures were given to teach men how to rise to heaven, not how the heavens were made." Forgetting these simple facts, ignorant scientists and equally ignorant ecclesiastics have waged a foolish warfare. As a result astronomy, geology, and many other sciences have had to fight their way against the opposition of priests, cardinals, and popes. Thank God! a brighter day has dawned. We are learning that all lovers of truth are in many senses pupils in the one school—the school of Christ, which is the noblest university. The Bible is designed to reveal God and man in their mutual relations; it declares man's religious necessities and reveals the divine provision for these necessities. It makes allusion to nations only as they stood related to the development of this spiritual purpose. It thus comes to pass that what Voltaire called an "insignificant Syrian tribe" fills so large a space on the inspired page; that Egypt is scarcely mentioned between the time of Moses and Solomon; that Assyria, after a single passage in the Book of Genesis, is passed over in silence for fifteen hundred years!

Many criticize the Bible because it is not, and never proposed to be what they imagined it ought to be. It is not a universal encyclopædia, although it is wonderfully encyclopædic; not a universal history, although it is

The Oldest and Noblest History.

Within its own sphere it is authoritative and infallible. To insist upon its historical and scientific inerrancy is to mistake its true design and controlling purpose. We do not admit its errancy as many have affirmed it; but neither ought we to allow ourselves to believe that if errancy, historical or scientific, can be proved, the Bible is therefore errant and unauthoritative on religious subjects. Those who say that an error is found in the date of some ancient king or kingdom, or in the number engaged or killed in some ancient battle, that therefore we must give up the inspiration of the Bible and the divinity of the Lord, are guilty of illogical reasoning and of a foolish surrender to the toes of revelation. They ought not to stake the defense of the citadel on maintaining an unimportant outpost. In harmony in the details of testimony in our courts is not construed by judges and juries as necessarily a contradiction of the main fact, if on that point the witnesses harmonize. I have heard officers who were in the battle of Gettysburg contradict one another regarding some details of that historic conflict; but this discrepancy regarding unimportant facts would surely not justify a man in affirming that there never was a battle of Gettysburg. The Bible is absolutely authoritative on matters of our spiritual life and faith. This is its chosen sphere; this is its divine design. We do not admit that important errors have yet been proved either of an historical or scientific kind. On this point "a bill of particulars" is properly demanded of those who make the affirmation. They wisely refrain from meeting this demand; their modesty at this point is surprisingly in contrast with their omniscience at many other points. We simply affirm that all allusions in the Bible to matters of that kind are merely incidental, and do not touch nor affect the main purpose of the revelation.

The critic of the Bible should be sympathetic. This demand is scientific. No man can appreciate the hills except he have mountains in his brain; no man can enjoy the sea except he have oceans in his soul; no one can judge music except his training and nature be musical. The mathematician who asked, after reading Milton's "Paradise Lost," "What does that prove?" was an utterly incompetent judge of that immortal epic. Sir Isaac Newton was right when he said to Dr. Halley, "When you speak about astronomy or mathematics, I am glad to hear you, for you have studied and understand these subjects; but you should not talk of Christianity for you have not studied it." Dr. Halley was on science, but utterly incompetent on matters of religion. To demand that critics of the Bible shall be sympathetic is to demand only that which we require in critics of science, philosophy or aesthetics. The cold-hearted, unsympathetic, irreligious critic of the Bible is a monstrosity. He is no more fitted to judge of its truths than a deaf man is to pronounce on music, or a blind man on the merits of a painting.

We have a right also to demand that all investigations of the Bible shall be practical—shall be affirmative or constructive, and not merely negative or destructive. The Higher Criticism might fairly be called general criticism. It discusses not merely the text, but its general relations; its relations to the chapter in which it is found, to the book of which it is a part, to the times to which it is referred, and to its entire environment. "It is," as Professor Stevens, of Rochester, has recently said, "history engaged in verifying the facts of the past." Mere textual criticism is lower criticism; but the investigation which takes up a book, its history, its structure, its credentials, this is called the Higher Criticism. When this kind of examination is applied to the Bible, it is properly called

"Biblical Criticism."

Let no one fear such criticism, if conducted in the spirit which we have described. Let no one denounce men inspired by this spirit and working for the discovery of truth; let no one deprecate the results secured, nor unfairly oppose the methods employed. If the investigation be in a humble and candid spirit, it will but reflect an additional honor on God and his Word. It will, without doubt, when so conducted, give fairer conceptions alike of the Bible and its divine Author. If it shall destroy some of the unsightly scaffolds which traditional interpretations, and which some human creeds and confessions, have erected about the majestic temple of truth, marring its symmetry and robbing it of its divine glory, we shall have cause to rejoice. The Word of God shall stand forever; that is as certain as that God lives and reigns.

Many men have entered the arena to tilt against Moses and the Pentateuch. Pharaoh strove against Moses, and he sank like lead into the Red Sea. Jannes and Jambres, the Egyptian magicians, withstood Moses, and they are named only to show their defeat and humiliation. It has been well said that the Bible is like a cube; when it is overturned, as its foes have thought, it is as high as before. The great scholars of the early centuries attempted to overthrow Christianity and the Bible; but the names of most of them are now utterly forgotten, except as they stand in some way related to the Bible which they vainly attempted to overthrow. Lucian, Celsus, Porphyry and Julian the Apostate were

The Leaders of the Opposition to the Lord Jesus Christ and his Church in their respective generations. Porphyry was, without doubt, one of the most brilliant opponents which Christianity has ever had. He was a peerless heathen polemic. He moved boldly into the arena; he was resolved to dethrone Jesus Christ. He anticipated many of the critical methods which are common in our day; but these men would be utterly forgotten were it not that they linked their names, even in opposition, with that Name which is above every other name. Jesus Christ is King. From his watchtower in the heavens he rules this world. His pierced hand is on the helm of the universe. Men have, in their own opinion, been constantly engaged in overthrowing the Bible; but the work has to be constantly repeated. Never did any other book have such vitality. It constantly confronts its foes with new elements of power. It never was mightier than it is to-day. It has overthrown many forms of heathenism, and is now moving forward with head erect and step triumphant to the conquest of the world.

The critics have long been giving their opinion on Moses. It would be interesting to have the opinion of Moses on some of his critics. Those who confronted Moses alive, whether in the court of Pharaoh, on the field of battle, or in the councils of nations, found him a foeman worthy of their steel. Were he not dead his critics would be likely to speak more modestly of their own attainments, and more wisely of his achievements.

Destructive Criticism.

Mere destructive criticism is worthy of but little respect. In no other sphere can the minimum of talent so certainly secure the maximum of notice. A child or an idiot with a knife or a hammer, let loose in a gallery of paintings or a hall of statuary, can destroy more in an hour than Angelo or Raphael could create in a lifetime. Destructive criticism requires but little ability and has but little utility. At times it may have a mission. It may awaken curiosity; it may evoke inquiry. Many a minister can attract no attention by earnestly expounding the Gospel; but the same man by attacking the Gospel and denouncing recognized beliefs will have a brief notoriety in the secular and religious press. By once hurling a hymn-book from his pulpit at the windows of his church, many a pastor would attract more notice than by ordinary preaching for a score of years. But mere destruction is unworthy the ambition of a noble man and the attainments of a broad scholar. God often overrules destructive work, however, for the establishment of his truth. The opposition of Porphyry in his day called into the arena of Christ and his Gospel. The attacks upon Christianity in our day have only served to show the solidity of its deep foundations. Let no believer be alarmed; let no one feel obliged to steady the ark of God; God will care for his word and his work. The business of the pulpit is to preach the truth and not to apologize for God and the Bible. A pastor is engaged in a sorry labor when he is simply unsettling the beliefs of men, and robbing the Bible of its authority and beauty. A man of this character may have some sphere of usefulness, but it is certainly not in the pulpit or church of God.

Many Defenders

It is fair to ask what the higher criticism has accomplished. This question we have a right to ask. Once more the Bible is on trial. Many of those who sought its life, as we have already said, are dead, as were those who sought the life of the Child Jesus; but other opponents have arisen in their place. What really has the higher criticism accomplished? It has shown, we will admit, that Moses did not write all the Pentateuch. But who, of any intelligence, ever believed that he did? Certainly no reasonable student could suppose that he wrote the account of his own death. The higher criticism has shown, we will admit, that in the writing of various documents were employed. But the critics contradict themselves constantly as to the points of union and cleavage in these documents. One might, before passing judgment on their work, wait until they had gotten through with destroying one another; for the higher critics of one generation spend much of their time in denouncing their brethren of a preceding generation. All the rest of us might be contented to wait until they are through with one another, and then we might gather up the fragments of critics and criticisms which may remain; but we need not take refuge behind these warring critics. Surely no intelligent reader, even though he is not a higher critic, doubts or doubted that various documents entered into the preparations of the Pentateuch. Surely we may give Moses credit for being a man of common sense; his wonderful achievements entitle him, even in the judgment of his harshest critics, to at least this much praise. Even an average historian would take advantage of documents and annals to which he had access in preparing his history. Hume, Macaulay, Motley, Bancroft did likewise; so also do the historians of our day. We could name a widely known ecclesiastical historian who not only has the assistance of other writings, but, it is said, of many writers in preparing his volumes on the history of the Church. They are not less his because of this method of preparation. Representative higher critics admit that the Pentateuch is written under the influence and guidance of Moses. More we do not need; more we neither claim nor desire. It is, in a special and beautiful sense, a glorious and Divine Mosaic.

What if the accounts of creation are but a series of grand panoramic views? They may be none the less true. We know that the language is not scientific but scenic; that it is not philosophic but poetic, as Dr. Boardman has suggested. Is it not, therefore, the more natural and accurate? We have no difficulty with the conception that in these glowing chapters we have unrolled before us, as before Moses, successive events in great spiritual visions. We did not need the wisdom of the latter-day higher critics to teach us these acknowledged truths. They have told us that Isaiah did not write all the book which bears his name—that there were at least two Isaiahs. Perhaps they are right, perhaps they are not. Internal evidence is not conclusive. We cannot decide such questions in the case of Junius and others of a comparatively recent date. The matter is not important. Personally, I should be glad to know that there were twenty-two Isaiahs instead of two. He is exactly the kind of man whom we should like to see greatly multiplied. Recent criticism may yet shed some light on the interpretation of the Song of Solomon and on predictive prophecy; but as yet it has given us an uncertain twilight.

The Test of Value.

Has this criticism deepened the piety of the Church? Has it quickened its zeal? Has it led to a greater consecration to work and a stronger desire to live for the glory of Christ and the salvation of men? No positive answer can yet be given to these questions; but this criticism has done good just so far as it has discovered truth; but not when it has simply dealt in mere destruction and has forgotten that divine charity, which "vaunteth not itself," and "is not puffed up." The true position for the church to take is that of appreciation of truth wherever found, and by whatsoever messenger brought; that of patient waiting until undigested theories are verified and vain speculations are conclusively proved. It is needless to oppose unverified theories; and it is wicked to cling to old prejudices when new truths are proved. What we want is neither the old theology, nor the new theology, but the true theology. God will not leave us in doubt. His Word is not a system of cunningly devised fables. It is my firm conviction that the Higher Criticism has not thus far achieved practical results sufficient to justify its exaggerated claims; neither has it so opposed truths previously held as to justify the opposition of some conservative and orthodox theologians. It is itself on trial; let us calmly wait; let us be open, frank and fair; let us not denounce the motives of earnest scholars who, with us, are seeking after truth.

Basal Truths.

There are great basal truths which must forever abide. Human sin and sorrow are terrific facts. The birth, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ are eternal verities. There is a science of salvation. God's sovereign and eternal love, God's gracious Fatherhood and forgiving mercy are eternal verities. Christ lives, and he himself said, in his matchless intercessory prayer, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." With undaunted heart we stand beside the Cross to-day. In this sign we shall conquer the world; that Cross is still the power and the wisdom of God; it is still the mightiest magnet to draw men from self and sin to holiness and heaven. We want the blessed Gospel, old as as eternity and new as the last rays of sunshine which flooded the earth with the light and glory of heaven. Nothing but the bread of heaven can feed the hungry soul; nothing but the blessed balm of Gilead can heal the heart's sorrow. Blessed be God, his Gospel will never lose its power until Satan is crushed beneath our feet and Christ is worshipped as Lord over all, blessed forever.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietors, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people

SORROWS THAT CANNOT BE TOLD.

THE world knoweth many a sorrow—
'Tis smitten with grief to the core;
It counteth full many a heart-break,
And soon will count multitudes more.
Perchance we may share some heart's burden—

While tears of sweet sympathy flow,
But ah! who shall comfort the weeper,
Whose sorrow no other must know?

Sometimes 'tis the heart that is saddest,
Which prompts to the merriest jest,
And sometimes the face that seems glad-dest

Is masking a cruel unrest.
The life that seems gayest and freest,
Unspeakable anguish may hold,
And souls may grow faint in their struggles
With sorrows that cannot be told.

Be tender with nature's unlovely,
Whose lives shed no blessed perfume, Whose words breathe not patience and courage—

Whose faces are shadowed with gloom.
Deal gently in judging thy brother—
Oh! call him not heartless and cold,
It may be his spirit is battling
With sorrows that cannot be told.

Yes, always be tender and loving,
Be patient with all you may know,
Lest you add some pain to the heartache
That maybe is lurking below.

Oh, tell of the Christ, whose compassion
And infinite love will uphold;
He has sounded the depths of all sorrow—
To him may all sorrows be told.

SAFE AT HOME.

(JOHN 5: 24.)

TELL me not a Christian dieth
When his spirit takes its flight,
'Tis but going home to heaven
To the land of pure delight;
Death hath lost its power o'er us,
For, amid earth's cares and strife,
If we're trusting Christ the Saviour
We have "passed from death to life."

It is hard to part with dear ones,
Whom we've known and loved so long,
But, if we are true and faithful
We will join that happy throng:
We'll be welcomed home to glory
When our pilgrimage is o'er,
By the loved ones gone before us—
Safe at home forever more.

Is it right to grieve for loved ones
Who have reached the glory land,
And are safe from all temptations,
With the happy ransomed band?
No; we'll bow in sweet submission
To our heavenly Father's will,
For he doeth all things wisely,
And we'll serve and love him still.

THE SEVENTH TRUMPET.

The Mystery—The Two Women—The Mystic Babylon and its Doom.

BY REV. JOHN STORIE.

BABYLON was thus the fruitful source of Demon Worship, the organized opposition to God, which has raised its head in varied forms and times in the history of the world.

It originated in that old Babylon and in Babylon's first king. In defiance of the known will of heaven, that city was built in the plain of Shinar; and built as the centre of a revolted kingdom and the seat of a worship, sensual, idolatrous, and proud—the worship of the fallen Angel and his demon host. They named the city Babel, that is, "The Gate of God"—of the new god they intended to establish. The man, who headed this apostasy and this body of rebels, was Nimrod, whose very name means a rebellious panther. In Genesis it is said that "he was a mighty hunter before the Lord;" as one Heb. Targum reads it, "a mighty rebel before the Lord."

In this ancient Babylon and in this early apostasy first rose the names and the adoration of false gods; the worship of the sun as the God of Day, and of the dark powers of night; the worship of the mother and child; the doctrine of the immaculate conception; the assumption; the deification of the woman; the coronation and session of this great harlot on the throne of heaven; and here, too, were first established the licentious orgies connected with the worship of Astarte and then of Venus.

In this Babylon began the consecration, the deification, the worship of images and sacred relics, and idolatries of every form; the use of holy waters; the sacred mysteries; the belief in purgatorial purifications; and all the instruments and appendages of demon worship.

In this Babylon was first established a priestly caste, claiming to represent the Deity, to be depositaries of the true faith, to interpret the Divine will, to avert the Divine judgment, to sit in the confessional, and there, with delegated authority from heaven, to search into the passions and weaknesses of the soul and the crimes and vices of the past life, and to absolve or refuse absolution.

In fact from this Babylonian birthplace, spread through all lands the abominations and pollutions of worship. In Egypt, in Phœnicia, in Asia Minor, in Persia, in India, as far East as China, Thibet, Japan, the inhabitants of the earth were made "drunk with her wine." The daughters of this mother invaded Greece and Rome. They kindled the Druid fires in Britain; even in Scandinavia and Iceland the early inhabitants drunk of her cup; and as far as Mexico in the West was the legend of Nimrod borne from Babylon; and, with that legend, Babylon's poisoned faith. "Thus saith the Lord, . . . Babylon hath been a golden cup in the Lord's hand that made all the nations drunken. . . . The nations have drunk of her wine. Therefore are the nations mad."

Her seats of Power. She has two; the Beast, and the waters (17:3, 15). She is seated on the Beast:—"I saw a woman sitting upon a scarlet Beast, . . . having seven heads, and, on each head, the name of blasphemy." This Beast is that same world Empire, fierce, strong and oppressive—the subject of so many predictions—which is to rise in seven periods of power, under the special inspiration of him who is the prince of this fallen world, each headed by a great Anti-Christian monarch in close allegiance with him. In each successive period of its predominance, the Imperial Head of this world Empire has yielded, and is to yield, to the corrupting influence of this great harlot, Babylon; and sustains her in ecclesiastical pride and dominion as his own spiritual mistress.

These seven Imperial Heads are symbolized here as "Seven Mountains," massive, strong, immovable. Such are they to the eye of sense, and such to this woman in her infatuated pride. On these she sits enthroned, as if resting upon the foundation of the eternal hills. She rides on through the ages and through the nations, in the majesty and glory of her spell-bound monarchs; inspires their fanaticism; rules them with her sorceries; sways their administration; uses their strength to put down all resistance to her dark and idolatrous control; and saith in her heart, "I sit as a Queen; I am no widow; I shall see no mourning."

(To be Concluded.)

TAMING THE TONGUE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning March 18. James 3: 2-12.

CT first sight the idea of any member of the body needing to be tamed, as if it were a wild beast, seems absurd. Yet the need exists and the inspired writer in describing the evils that come from the tongue, when it is untamed, does not exaggerate. Who is there that has not at some time suffered from reckless speech? The sneer, the taunt, the slander and the lie have ruined many a life. It is true that the source of the mischief lies back of that, in the unkind and malicious spirit, but the harm would not be active if the tongue did not give it utterance. The silent malice would corrupt the soul and poison the mind, but others would not be hurt by it. The gotten it. The inspired writer knew whereof he wrote when he described the tongue as unruly and did not overestimate the achievement of bringing it under subjection when he said that he who could do it was "able to bridle the whole body also." But the statement is not made to discourage us, but rather to stimulate us to the effort. No man can tame it, as he says; but they who have committed their whole being to God, to be re-made find that what is impossible with man is possible with God.

AN OHIO Y. M. C. A.

The substantial and commodious building, a picture of which appears on this page, is the home of the Young Men's Christian Association of Canton, Ohio. Although the Association is only eight years old, having been organized in 1886, there appears to be no lack of energy on the part
